CONVENTION [1] ON THE LAW APPLICABLE TO CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATIONS OPENED FOR SIGNATURE IN ROME ON 19 JUNE 1980

PREAMBLE

THE HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community,

ANXIOUS to continue in the field of private international law the work of unification of law which has already been done within the Community, in particular in the field of jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments,

WISHING to establish uniform rules concerning the law applicable to contractual obligations,

HAVE AGREED AS FOLLOWS:

TITLE I

SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

Article 1

Scope of the Convention

1. The rules of this Convention shall apply to contractual obligations in any situation involving a choice between the laws of different countries.

2. They shall not apply to:

(a) questions involving the status or legal capacity of natural persons, without prejudice to Article 11;

(b) contractual obligations relating to:

- wills and succession,

- rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship,

- rights and duties arising out of a family relationship, parentage, marriage or affinity, including maintenance obligations in respect of children who are not legitimate;

(c) obligations arising under bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments to the extent that the obligations under such other negotiable instruments arise out of their negotiable character;

(d) arbitration agreements and agreements on the choice of court;

(e) questions governed by the law of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate such as the creation, by registration or otherwise, legal capacity, internal organisation or winding up of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate and the personal liability of officers and members as such for the obligations of the company or body;

(f) the question whether an agent is able to bind a principal, or an organ to bind a company or body corporate or unincorporate, to a third party;

(g) the constitution of trusts and the relationship between settlors, trustees and beneficiaries;

(h) evidence and procedure, without prejudice to Article 14.

3. The rules of this Convention do not apply to contracts of insurance which cover risks situated in the territories of the Member States of the European Economic Community. In order to determine whether a risk is situated in those territories the court shall apply its internal law.

4. The preceding paragraph does not apply to contracts of re-insurance.

Article 2

Application of law of non-contracting States

Any law specified by this Convention shall be applied whether or not it is the law of a Contracting State.

TITLE II

UNIFORM RULES

Article 3

Freedom of choice

1. A contract shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties. The choice must be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the terms of the contract or the circumstances of the case. By their choice the parties can select the law applicable to the whole or a part only of the contract.

2. The parties may at any time agree to subject the contract to a law other than that which previously governed it, whether as a result of an earlier choice under this Article or of other provisions of this Convention. Any variation by the parties of the law to be applied made after the conclusion of the contract shall not prejudice its formal validity under Article 9 or adversely affect the rights of third parties.

3. The fact that the parties have chosen a foreign law, whether or not accompanied by the choice of a foreign tribunal, shall not, where all the other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are connected with one country only, prejudice the application of rules of the law at the country which cannot be derogated from by contract, hereinafter called "mandatory rules".

4. The existence and validity of the consent of the parties as to the choice of the applicable law shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of Articles 8, 9 and 11.

Applicable law in the absence of choice

1. To the extent that the law applicable to the contract has not been chosen in accordance with Article 3, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected. Nevertheless, a separable part of the contract which has a closer connection with another country may by way of exception be governed by the law of that other country.

2. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 5 of this Article, it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with the country where the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has, at the time of conclusion of the contract, his habitual residence, or, in the case of a body corporate or unincorporate, its central administration. However, if the contract is entered into in the course of that party's trade or profession, that country shall be the country in which the principal place of business is situated or, where under the terms of the contract the performance is to be effected through a place of business other than the principal place of business, the country in which that other place of business is situated.

3. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 2 of this Article, to the extent that the subject matter of the contract is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with the country where the immovable property is situated.

4. A contract for the carriage of goods shall not be subject to the presumption in paragraph 2. In such a contract if the country in which, at the time the contract is concluded, the carrier has his principal place of business is also the country in which the place of loading or the place of discharge or the principal place of business of the consignor is situated, it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with that country. In applying this paragraph single voyage charter-parties and other contracts the main purpose of which is the carriage of goods shall be treated as contracts for the carriage of goods.

5. Paragraph 2 shall not apply if the characteristic performance cannot be determined, and the presumptions in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 shall be disregarded if it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country.

Certain consumer contracts

1. This Article applies to a contract the object of which is the supply of goods or services to a person ("the consumer") for a purpose which can be regarded as being outside his trade or profession, or a contract for the provision of credit for that object.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 3, a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the consumer of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence:

- if in that country the conclusion of the contract was preceded by a specific invitation addressed to him or by advertising, and he had taken in that country all the steps necessary on his part for the conclusion of the contract, or

- if the other party or his agent received the consumer's order in that country, or

- if the contract is for the sale of goods and the consumer travelled from that country to another country and there gave his order, provided that the consumer's journey was arranged by the seller for the purpose of inducing the consumer to buy.

3. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4, a contract to which this Article applies shall, in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, be governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence if it is entered into in the circumstances described in paragraph 2 of this Article.

4. This Article shall not apply to:

(a) a contract of carriage;

(b) a contract for the supply of services where the services are to be supplied to the consumer exclusively in a country other than that in which he has his habitual residence.

5. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 4, this Article shall apply to a contract which, for an inclusive price, provides for a combination of travel and accommodation.

Individual employment contracts

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 3, in a contract of employment a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the employee of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law which would be applicable under paragraph 2 in the absence of choice.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4, a contract of employment shall, in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, be governed:

(a) by the law of the country in which the employee habitually carries out his work in performance of the contract, even if he is temporarily employed in another country; or

(b) if the employee does not habitually carry out his work in any one country, by the law of the country in which the place of business through which he was engaged is situated;

unless it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country, in which case the contract shall be governed by the law of that country.

Mandatory rules

1. When applying under this Convention the law of a country, effect may be given to the mandatory rules of the law of another country with which the situation has a close connection, if and in so far as, under the law of the latter country, those rules must be applied whatever the law applicable to the contract. In considering whether to give effect to these mandatory rules, regard shall be had to their nature and purpose and to the consequences of their application or non-application.

2. Nothing in this Convention shall restrict the application of the rules of the law of the forum in a situation where they are mandatory irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the contract.

Article 8

Material validity

1. The existence and validity of a contract, or of any term of a contract, shall be determined by the law which would govern it under this Convention if the contract or term were valid.

2. Nevertheless a party may rely upon the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence to establish that he did not consent if it appears from the circumstances that it would not be reasonable to determine the effect of his conduct in accordance with the law specified in the preceding paragraph.

Formal validity

1. A contract concluded between persons who are in the same country is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it under this Convention or of the law of the country where it is concluded.

2. A contract concluded between persons who are in different countries is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it under this Convention or of the law of one of those countries.

3. Where a contract is concluded by an agent, the country in which the agent acts is the relevant country for the purposes of paragraphs 1 and 2.

4. An act intended to have legal effect relating to an existing or contemplated contract is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which under this Convention governs or would govern the contract or of the law of the country where the act was done.

5. The provisions of the preceding paragraphs shall not apply to a contract to which Article 5 applies, concluded in the circumstances described in paragraph 2 of Article 5. The formal validity of such a contract is governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence.

6. Notwithstanding paragraphs 1 to 4 of this Article, a contract the subject matter of which is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property shall be subject to the mandatory requirements of form of the law of the country where the property is situated if by that law those requirements are imposed irrespective of the country where the contract is concluded and irrespective of the law governing the contract.

Article 10

Scope of applicable law

1. The law applicable to a contract by virtue of Articles 3 to 6 and 12 of this Convention shall govern in particular:

(a) interpretation;

(b) performance;

(c) within the limits of the powers conferred on the court by its procedural law, the consequences of breach, including the assessment of damages in so far as it is governed by rules of law;

(d) the various ways of extinguishing obligations, and prescription and limitation of actions;

(e) the consequences of nullity of the contract.

2. In relation to the manner of performance and the steps to be taken in the event of defective performance regard shall be had to the law of the country in which performance takes place.

Incapacity

In a contract concluded between persons who are in the same country, a natural person who would have capacity under the law of that country may invoke his incapacity resulting from another law only if the other party to the contract was aware of this incapacity at the time of the conclusion of the contract or was not aware thereof as a result of negligence.

Article 12

Voluntary assignment

1. The mutual obligations of assignor and assignee under a voluntary assignment of a right against another person ("the debtor") shall be governed by the law which under this Convention applies to the contract between the assignor and assignee.

2. The law governing the right to which the assignment relates shall determine its assignability, the relationship between the assignee and the debtor, the conditions under which the assignment can be invoked against the debtor and any question whether the debtor's obligations have been discharged.

Subrogation

1. Where a person ("the creditor") has a contractual claim upon another ("the debtor"), and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, or has in fact satisfied the creditor in discharge of that duty, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether the third person is entitled to exercise against the debtor the rights which the creditor had against the debtor under the law governing their relationship and, if so, whether he may do so in full or only to a limited extent.

2. The same rule applies where several persons are subject to the same contractual claim and one of them has satisfied the creditor.

Burden of proof, etc.

1. The law governing the contract under this Convention applies to the extent that it contains, in the law of contract, rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. A contract or an act intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognised by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 9 under which that contract or act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

Exclusion of convoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Convention means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law.

Article 16

"Ordre public"

The application of a rule of the law of any country specified by this Convention may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy ("ordre public") of the forum.

Article 17

No retrospective effect

This Convention shall apply in a Contracting State to contracts made after the date on which this Convention has entered into force with respect to that State.

Article 18

Uniform interpretation

In the interpretation and application of the preceding uniform rules, regard shall be had to their international character and to the desirability of achieving uniformity in their interpretation and application.

States with more than one legal system

1. Where a State comprises several territorial units each of which has its own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Convention.

2. A State within which different territorial units have their own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations shall not be bound to apply this Convention to conflicts solely between the laws of such units.

Article 20

Precedence of Community law

This Convention shall not affect the application of provisions which, in relation to particular matters, lay down choice of law rules relating to contractual obligations and which are or will be contained in acts of the institutions of the European Communities or in national laws harmonised in implementation of such acts.

Article 21

Relationship with other conventions

This Convention shall not prejudice the application of international conventions to which a Contracting State is, or becomes, a party.

Article 22

Reservations

1. Any Contracting State may, at the time of signature, ratification, acceptance or approval, reserve the right not to apply:

(a) the provisions of Article 7(1);

(b) the provisions of Article 10(1) (e).

2. [2]

3. Any Contracting State may at any time withdraw a reservation which it has made; the reservation shall cease to have effect on the first day of the third calendar month after notification of the withdrawal.

TITLE III

FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 23

1. If, after the date on which this Convention has entered into force for a Contracting State, that State wishes to adopt any new choice of law rule in regard to any particular category of contract within the scope of this Convention, it shall communicate its intention to the other signatory States through the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

2. Any signatory State may, within six months from the date of the communication made to the Secretary-General, request him to arrange consultations between signatory States in order to reach agreement. (...) [3].

3. If no signatory State has requested consultations within this period or if within two years following the communication made to the Secretary-General no agreement is reached in the course of consultations, the Contracting State concerned may amend its law in the manner indicated. The measures taken by that State shall be brought to the knowledge of the other signatory States through the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

Article 24

1. If, after the date on which this Convention has entered into force with respect to a Contracting State, that State wishes to become a party to a multilateral convention whose principal aim or one of whose principal aims is to lay down rules of private international law concerning any of the matters governed by this Convention, the procedure set out in Article 23 shall apply. However, the period of two years, referred to in paragraph 3 of that Article, shall be reduced to one year.

2. The procedure referred to in the preceding paragraph need not be followed if a Contracting State or one of the European Communities is already a party to the multilateral convention, or if its object is to revise a convention to which the State concerned is already a party, or if it is a convention concluded within the framework of the Treaties establishing the European Communities.

Article 25

If a Contracting State considers that the unification achieved by this Convention is prejudiced by the conclusion of agreements not covered by Article 24(1), that State may request the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities to arrange consultations between the signatory States of this Convention.

Article 26

Any Contracting State may request the revision of this Convention. In this event a revision conference shall be convened by the President of the Council of the European Communities.

Article 27 [4]

1. This Convention shall be open from 19 June 1980 for signature by the States party to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community.

This Convention shall be subject to ratification, acceptance or approval by the signatory States. The instruments of ratification, acceptance or approval shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities [5].

1. This Convention shall enter into force on the first day of the third month following the deposit of the seventh instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval.

2. This Convention shall enter into force for each signatory State ratifying, accepting or approving at a later date on the first day of the third month following the deposit of its instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval.

Article 30

1. This Convention shall remain in force for 10 years from the date of its entry into force in accordance with Article 29(1), even for States for which it enters into force at a later date.

2. If there has been no denunciation it shall be renewed tacitly every five years.

3. A Contracting State which wishes to denounce shall, not less than six months before the expiration of the period of 10 or five years, as the case may be, give notice to the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities. [7].

4. The denunciation shall have effect only in relation to the State which has notified it. The Convention will remain in force as between all other Contracting States.

The Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities shall notify the States party to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community of:

(a) the signatures;

(b) deposit of each instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval;

(c) the date of entry into force of this Convention;

(d) communications made in pursuance of Articles 23, 24, 25, 26 and 30 [9];

(e) the reservations and withdrawals of reservations referred to in Article 22.

Article 32

The Protocol annexed to this Convention shall form an integral part thereof.

This Convention, drawn up in a single original in the Danish, Dutch, English, French, German, Irish and Italian languages, these texts being equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Secretariat of the Council of the European Communities. The Secretary-General shall transmit a certified copy thereof to the Government of each signatory State.

1980 Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations (consolidated version)

Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations (consolidated version)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The signing on 29 November 1996 of the Convention on the accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden to the Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations and to the two Protocols on its interpretation by the Court of Justice has made it desirable to produce a consolidated version of the Rome convention and of those two Protocols.

These texts are accompanied by three Declarations, one made in 1980 with regard to the need for consistency between measures to be adopted on choice-of-law rules by the Community and those under the Convention, a second, also made in 1980, on the interpretation of the Convention by the Court of Justice and a third, made in 1996, concerning compliance with the procedure provided for in Article 23 of the Rome Convention as regards carriage of goods by sea.

The text printed in this edition was drawn up by the General Secretariat of the Council, in whose archives the originals of the instruments concerned are deposited. It should be noted, however, that this text has no binding force. The official texts of the instruments consolidated are to be found in the following Official Journals.

ANNEX

CONVENTION on the law applicable to contractual obligations (1) opened for signature in Rome on 19 June 1980

PREAMBLE

THE HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community,

ANXIOUS to continue in the field of private international law the work of unification of law which has already been done within the Community, in particular in the field of jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments,

WISHING to establish uniform rules concerning the law applicable to contractual obligations,

HAVE AGREED AS FOLLOWS:

TITLE I

SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

Article 1 Scope of the Convention

1. The rules of this Convention shall apply to contractual obligations in any situation involving a choice between the laws of different countries.

2. They shall not apply to:

(a) questions involving the status or legal capacity of natural persons, without prejudice to Article 11;

(b) contractual obligations relating to:

- wills and succession,
- rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship,
- rights and duties arising out of a family relationship, parentage, marriage or affinity, including maintenance obligations in respect of children who are not legitimate;

(c) obligations arising under bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments to the extent that the obligations under such other negotiable instruments arise out of their negotiable character;

(d) arbitration agreements and agreements on the choice of court;

(c) questions governed by the law of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate such as the creation, by registration or otherwise, legal capacity, internal organization or winding up of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate and the personal liability of officers and members as such for the obligations of the company or body;

(f) the question whether an agent is able to bind a principal, or an organ to bind a company or body corporate or unincorporate, to a third party;

(g) the constitution of trusts and the relationship between settlors, trustees and beneficiaries;

(h) evidence and procedure, without prejudice to Article 14.

3. The rules of this Convention do not apply to contracts of insurance which cover risks situated in the territories of the Member States of the European Economic Community. In order to determine whether a risk is situated in those territories the court shall apply its internal law.

4. The proceeding paragraph does not apply to contracts of re-insurance.

Article 2 Application of law of non-contracting States

Any law specified by this Convention shall be applied whether or not it is the law of a Contracting State.

TITLE II

Article 3 Freedom of choice

1. A contract shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties. The choice must be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the terms of the contract or the circumstances of the case. By their choice the parties can select the law applicable to the whole or a part only of the contract.

2. The parties may at any time agree to subject the contract to a law other than that which previously governed it, whether as a result of an earlier choice under this Article or of other provisions of this Convention. Any variation by the parties of the law to be applied made after the conclusion of the contract shall not prejudice its formal validity under Article 9 or adversely affect the rights of third parties.

3. The fact that the parties have chosen a foreign law, whether or not accompanied by the choice of a foreign tribunal, shall not, where all the other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are connected with one country only, prejudice the application of rules of the law at the country which cannot be derogated from by contract, hereinafter called 'mandatory rules`.

4. The existence and validity of the consent of the parties as to the choice of the applicable law shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of Articles 8, 9 and 11.

Article 4 Applicable law in the absence of choice

1. To the extent that the law applicable to the contract has not been chosen in accordance with Article 3, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected. Nevertheless, a separable part of the contract which has a closer connection with another country may by way of exception be governed by the law of that other country.

2. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 5 of this Article, it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with the country where the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has, at the time of conclusion of the contract, his habitual residence, or, in the case of a body corporate or unincorporate, its central administration. However, if the contract is entered into in the course of that party's trade or profession, that country shall be the country in which the principal place of business is situated or, where under the terms of the contract the performance is to be effected through a place of business other than the principal place of business, the country in which that other place of business is situated.

3. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 2 of this Article, to the extent that the subject matter of the contract is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with the country where the immovable property is situated.

4. A contract for the carriage of goods shall not be subject to the presumption in paragraph 2. In such a contract if the country in which, at the time the contract is concluded, the carrier has his principal place of business is also the country in which the place of loading or the place of discharge or the principal place of business of the consignor is situated, it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with that country. In applying this paragraph single voyage charter-parties and other contracts the main purpose of which is the carriage of goods shall be treated as contracts for the carriage of goods.

5. Paragraph 2 shall not apply if the characteristic performance cannot be determined, and the presumptions in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 shall be disregarded if it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country.

Article 5 Certain consumer contracts

1. This Article applies to a contract the object of which is the supply of goods or services to a person ('the consumer`) for a purpose which can be regarded as being outside his trade or profession, or a contract for the provision of credit for that object.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 3, a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the consumer of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence:

- if in that country the conclusion of the contract was preceded by a specific invitation addressed to him or by advertising, and he had taken in that country all the steps necessary on his part for the conclusion of the contract, or
- if the other party or his agent received the consumer's order in that country, or
- if the contract is for the sale of goods and the consumer travelled from that country to another country and there gave his order, provided that the consumer's journey was arranged by the seller for the purpose of inducing the consumer to buy.

3. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4, a contract to which this Article applies shall, in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, be governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence if it is entered into in the circumstances described in paragraph 2 of this Article.

4. This Article shall not apply to:

(a) a contract of carriage;

(b) a contract for the supply of services where the services are to be supplied to the consumer exclusively in a country other than that in which he has his habitual residence.

5. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 4, this Article shall apply to a contract which, for an inclusive price, provides for a combination of travel and accommodation.

Article 6 Individual employment contracts

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 3, in a contract of employment a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the employee of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law which would be applicable under paragraph 2 in the absence of choice.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4, a contract of employment shall, in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, be governed:

(a) by the law of the country in which the employee habitually carries out his work in performance of the contract, even if he is temporarily employed in another country; or

(b) if the employee does not habitually carry out his work in any one country, by the law of the country in which the place of business through which he was engaged is situated;

unless it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country, in which case the contract shall be governed by the law of that country.

Article 7 Mandatory rules

1. When applying under this Convention the law of a country, effect may be given to the mandatory rules of the law of another country with which the situation has a close connection, if and in so far as, under the law of the latter country, those rules must be applied whatever the law applicable to the contract. In considering whether to give effect to these mandatory rules, regard shall be had to their nature and purpose and to the consequences of their application or non-application.

2. Nothing in this Convention shall restrict the application of the rules of the law of the forum in a situation where they are mandatory irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the contract.

Article 8 Material validity

1. The existence and validity of a contract, or of any term of a contract, shall be determined by the law which would govern it under this Convention if the contract or term were valid.

2. Nevertheless a party may rely upon the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence to establish that he did not consent if it appears from the circumstances that it would not be reasonable to determine the effect of his conduct in accordance with the law specified in the preceding paragraph.

Article 9 Formal validity

1. A contract concluded between persons who are in the same country is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it under this Convention or of the law of the country where it is concluded.

2. A contract concluded between persons who are in different countries is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it under this Convention or of the law of one of those countries.

3. Where a contract is concluded by an agent, the country in which the agent acts is the relevant country for the purposes of paragraphs 1 and 2.

4. An act intended to have legal effect relating to an existing or contemplated contract is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which under this Convention governs or would govern the contract or of the law of the country where the act was done.

5. The provisions of the preceding paragraphs shall not apply to a contract to which Article 5 applies, concluded in the circumstances described in paragraph 2 of Article 5. The formal validity of such a contract is governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence.

6. Notwithstanding paragraphs 1 to 4 of this Article, a contract the subject matter of which is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property shall be subject to the mandatory requirements of form of the law of the country where the property is situated if by that law those requirements are imposed irrespective of the country where the contract is concluded and irrespective of the law governing the contract.

Article 10 Scope of applicable law

1. The law applicable to a contract by virtue of Articles 3 to 6 and 12 of this Convention shall govern in particular:

(a) interpretation;

(b) performance;

(c) within the limits of the powers conferred on the court by its procedural law, the consequences of breach, including the assessment of damages in so far as it is governed by rules of law;

(d) the various ways of extinguishing obligations, and prescription and limitation of actions;

(e) the consequences of nullity of the contract.

2. In relation to the manner of performance and the steps to be taken in the event of defective performance regard shall be had to the law of the country in which performance takes place.

Article 11 Incapacity

In a contract concluded between persons who are in the same country, a natural person who would have capacity under the law of that country may invoke his incapacity resulting from another law only if the other party to the contract was aware of this incapacity at the time of the conclusion of the contract or was not aware thereof as a result of negligence.

Article 12 Voluntary assignment

1. The mutual obligations of assignor and assignee under a voluntary assignment of a right against another person ('the debter`) shall be governed by the law which under this Convention applies to the contract between the assignor and assignee.

2. The law governing the right to which the assignment relates shall determine its assignability, the relationship between the assignee and the debtor, the conditions under which the assignment can be invoked against the debtor and any question whether the debtor's obligations have been discharged.

Article 13 Subrogation

1. Where a person ('the creditor`) has a contractual claim upon another ('the debtor`), and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, or has in fact satisfied the creditor in discharge of that duty, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether the third person is entitled to exercise against the debtor the rights which the creditor had against the debtor under the law governing their relationship and, if so, whether he may do so in full or only to a limited extent.

2. The same rule applies where several persons are subject to the same contractual claim and one of them has satisfied the creditor.

Article 14 Burden of proof, etc.

1. The law governing the contract under this Convention applies to the extent that it contains, in the law of contract, rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. A contract or an act intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognized by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 9 under which that contract or act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

Article 15 Exclusion of convoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Convention means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law.

Article 16 'Ordre public`

The application of a rule of the law of any country specified by this Convention may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy ('ordre public`) of the forum.

Article 17 No retrospective effect

This Convention shall apply in a Contracting State to contracts made after the date on which this Convention has entered into force with respect to that State.

Article 18 Uniform interpretation

In the interpretation and application of the preceding uniform rules, regard shall be had to their international character and to the desirability of achieving uniformity in their interpretation and application.

Article 19 States with more than one legal system

1. Where a State comprises several territorial units each of which has its own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Convention.

2. A State within which different territorial units have their own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations shall not be bound to apply this Convention to conflicts solely between the laws of such units.

Article 20 Precedence of Community law

This Convention shall not affect the application of provisions which, in relation to particular matters, lay down choice of law rules relating to contractual obligations and which are or will be contained in acts of the institutions of the European Communities or in national laws harmonized in implementation of such acts.

Article 21 Relationship with other conventions

This Convention shall not prejudice the application of international conventions to which a Contracting State is, or becomes, a party.

Article 22 Reservations

1. Any Contracting State may, at the time of signature, ratification, acceptance or approval, reserve the right not to apply:

(a) the provisions of Article 7 (1);

(b) the provisions of Article 10 (1) (e).

2. . . . (2)

3. Any Contracting State may at any time withdraw a reservation which it has made; the reservation shall cease to have effect on the first day of the third calendar month after notification of the withdrawal.

TITLE III

FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 23

1. If, after the date on which this Convention has entered into force for a Contracting State, that State wishes to adopt any new choice of law rule in regard to any particular category of contract within the scope of this Convention, it shall communicate its intention to the other signatory States through the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

2. Any signatory State may, within six months from the date of the communication made to the Secretary-General, request him to arrange consultations between signatory States in order to reach agreement.

3. If no signatory State has requested consultations within this period or if within two years following the communication made to the Secretary-General no agreement is reached in the course of consultations, the Contracting State concerned may amend its law in the manner indicated. The measures taken by that State shall be brought to the knowledge of the other signatory States through the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

1. If, after the date on which this Convention has entered into force with respect to a Contracting State, that State wishes to become a party to a multilateral convention whose principal aim or one of whose principal aims is to lay down rules of private international law concerning any of the matters governed by this Convention, the procedure set out in Article 23 shall apply. However, the period of two years, referred to in paragraph 3 of that Article, shall be reduced to one year.

2. The procedure referred to in the preceding paragraph need not be followed if a Contracting State or one of the European Communities is already a party to the multilateral convention, or if its object is to revise a convention to which the State concerned is already a party, or if it is a convention concluded within the framework of the Treaties establishing the European Communities.

If a Contracting State considers that the unification achieved by this Convention is prejudiced by the conclusion of agreements not covered by Article 24 (1), that State may request the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities to arrange consultations between the signatory States of this Convention.

Article 26

Any Contracting State may request the revision of this Convention. In this event a revision conference shall be convened by the President of the Council of the European Communities.

of the seventh instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval.

2. This Convention shall enter into force for each signatory State ratifying, accepting or approving at a later date on the first day of the third month following the deposit of its instrument of ratification, acceptance or approval.

3. A Contracting State which wishes to denounce shall, not less than six months before the expiration of the period of 10 or five years, as the case may be, give notice to the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities. Denunciation may be limited to any territory to which the Convention has been extended by a declaration under Article 27 (2) (6).

4. The denunciation shall have effect only in relation to the State which has notified it. The Convention will remain in force as between all other Contracting States.

PREAMBLE

THE HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community,
ANXIOUS to continue in the field of private international law the work of unification of law which has already been done within the Community, in particular in the field of jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments, WISHING to establish uniform rules concerning the law applicable to contractual obligations,
HAVE AGREED AS FOLLOWS:

TITLE I SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

Article 1

Scope of the Convention

1. The rules of this Convention shall apply to contractual obligations in any situation involving a choice between the laws of different countries.

2. They shall not apply to: (a) questions involving the status or legal capacity of natural persons, without prejudice to Article 11;
(b) contractual obligations relating to: - wills and succession,
- rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship,
- rights and duties arising out of a family relationship, parentage, marriage or affinity, including maintenance obligations in respect of children who are not legitimate;

(c) obligations arising under bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments to the extent that the obligations under such other negotiable instruments arise out of their negotiable character;
(d) arbitration agreements and agreements on the choice of court;
(e) questions governed by the law of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate such as the creation, by registration or otherwise, legal capacity, internal organization or winding up of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate and the personal liability of officers and members as such for the obligations of the company or body;
(f) the question whether an agent is able to bind a principal, or an organ to bind a company or body corporate or unincorporate, to a third party;
(g) the constitution of trusts and the relationship between settlors, trustees and beneficiaries;
(h) evidence and procedure, without prejudice to Article 14.

3. The rules of this Convention do not apply to contracts of insurance which cover risks situated in the territories of the Member States of the European Economic Community. In order to determine whether a risk is situated in these territories the court shall apply its internal law.

4. The preceding paragraph does not apply to contracts of re-insurance.

Article 2

Application of law of non-contracting States

Any law specified by this Convention shall be applied whether or not it is the law of a Contracting State.

TITLE II UNIFORM RULES

Freedom of choice

1. A contract shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties. The choice must be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the terms of the contract or the circumstances of the case. By their choice the parties can select the law applicable to the whole or a part only of the contract.

2. The parties may at any time agree to subject the contract to a law other than that which previously governed it, whether as a result of an earlier choice under this Article or of other provisions of this Convention. Any variation by the parties of the law to be applied made after the conclusion of the contract shall not prejudice its formal validity under Article 9 or adversely affect the rights of third parties.

3. The fact that the parties have chosen a foreign law, whether or not accompanied by the choice of a foreign tribunal, shall not, where all the other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are connected with one country only, prejudice the application of rules of the law of that country which cannot be derogated from by contract, hereinafter called "mandatory rules".

4. The existence and validity of the consent of the parties as to the choice of the applicable law shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of Articles 8, 9 and 11.

Applicable law in the absence of choice

1. To the extent that the law applicable to the contract has not been chosen in accordance with Article 3, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected. Nevertheless, a severable part of the contract which has a closer connection with another country may by way of exception be governed by the law of that other country.

2. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 5 of this Article, it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with the country where the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has, at the time of conclusion of the contract, his habitual residence, or, in the case of a body corporate or unincorporate, its central administration. However, if the contract is entered into in the course of that party's trade or profession, that country shall be the country in which the principal place of business is situated or, where under the terms of the contract the performance is to be effected through a place of business other than the principal place of business, the country in which that other place of business is situated.

3. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 2 of this Article, to the extent that the subject matter of the contract is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with the country where the immovable property is situated.

4. A contract for the carriage of goods shall not be subject to the presumption in paragraph 2. In such a contract if the country in which, at the time the contract is concluded, the carrier has his principal place of business is also the country in which the place of loading or the place of discharge or the principal place of business of the consignor is situated, it shall be presumed that the contract is most closely connected with that country. In applying this paragraph single voyage charter-parties and other contracts the main purpose of which is the carriage of goods shall be treated as contracts for the carriage of goods.

5. Paragraph 2 shall not apply if the characteristic performance cannot be determined, and the presumptions in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 shall be disregarded if it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country.

Certain consumer contracts

1. This Article applies to a contract the object of which is the supply of goods or services to a person ("the consumer") for a purpose which can be regarded as being outside his trade or profession, or a contract for the provision of credit for that object.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 3, a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the consumer of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence:
- if in that country the conclusion of the contract was preceded by a specific invitation addressed to him or by advertising, and he had taken in that country all the steps necessary on his part for the conclusion of the contract, or
- if the other party or his agent received the consumer's order in that country, or
- if the contract is for the sale of goods and the consumer travelled from that country to another country and there gave his order, provided that the consumer's journey was arranged by the seller for the purpose of inducing the consumer to buy the purpose of inducing the consumer to buy.

3. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4, a contract to which this Article applies shall, in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, be governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence if it is entered into in the circumstances described in paragraph 2 of this Article.

4. This Article shall not apply to: (a) a contract of carriage;

(b) a contract for the supply of services where the services are to be supplied to the consumer exclusively in a country other than that in which he has his habitual residence.

5. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 4, this Article shall apply to a contract which, for an inclusive price, provides for a combination of travel and accommodation.

Individual employment contracts

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 3, in a contract of employment a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the employee of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law which would be applicable under paragraph 2 in the absence of choice.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4, a contract of employment shall, in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, be governed:
(a) by the law of the country in which the employee habitually carries out his work in performance of the contract, even if he is temporarily employed in another country ; or
(b) if the employee does not habitually carry out his work in any one country, by the law of the country in which the place of business through which he was engaged is situated; unless it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country, in which case the contract shall be governed by the law of that country.

Mandatory rules

1. When applying under this Convention the law of a country, effect may be given to the mandatory rules of the law of another country with which the situation has a close connection, if and in so far as, under the law of the latter country, those rules must be applied whatever the law applicable to the contract. In considering whether to give effect to these mandatory rules, regard shall be had to their nature and purpose and to the consequences of their application or non-application.

2. Nothing in this Convention shall restrict the application of the rules of the law of the forum in a situation where they are mandatory irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the contract.

Article 8

Material validity

1. The existence and validity of a contract, or of any term of a contract, shall be determined by the law which would govern it under this Convention if the contract or term were valid.

2. Nevertheless a party may rely upon the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence to establish that he did not consent if it appears from the circumstances that it would not be reasonable to determine the effect of his conduct in accordance with the law specified in the preceding paragraph.

Formal validity

1. A contract concluded between persons who are in the same country is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it under this Convention or of the law of the country where it is concluded.

2. A contract concluded between persons who are in different countries is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it under this Convention or of the law of one of those countries.

3. Where a contract is concluded by an agent, the country in which the agent acts is the relevant country for the purposes of paragraphs 1 and 2.

4. An act intended to have legal effect relating to an existing or contemplated contract is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which under this Convention governs or would govern if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which under this Convention governs or would govern the contract or of the law of the country where the act was done.

5. The provisions of the preceding paragraphs shall not apply to a contract to which Article 5 applies, concluded in the circumstances described in paragraph 2 of Article 5. The formal validity of such a contract is governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence.

6. Notwithstanding paragraphs 1 to 4 of this Article, a contract the subject matter of which is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property shall be subject to the mandatory requirements of form of the law of the country where the property is situated if by that law those requirements are imposed irrespective of the country where the contract is concluded and irrespective of the law governing the contract.

Scope of the applicable law

1. The law applicable to a contract by virtue of Articles 3 to 6 and 12 of this Convention shall govern in particular:
(a) interpretation;
(b) performance;
(c) within the limits of the powers conferred on the court by its procedural law, the consquences of breach, including the assessment of damages in so far as it is governed by rules of law;
(d) the various ways of extinguishing obligations, and prescription and limitation of actions;
(e) the consequences of nullity of the contract.

2. In relation to the manner of performance and the steps to be taken in the event of defective performance regard shall be had to the law of the country in which performance takes place.

Incapacity

In a contract concluded between persons who are in the same country, a natural person who would have capacity under the law of that country may invoke his incapacity resulting from another law only if the other party to the contract was aware of this incapacity at the time of the conclusion of the contract or was not aware thereof as a result of negligence.

Voluntary assignment

1. The mutual obligations of assignor and assignee under a voluntary assignment of a right against another person ("the debtor") shall be governed by the law which under this Convention applies to the contract between the assignor and assignee.

2. The law governing the right to which the assignment relates shall determine its assignability, the relationship between the assignee and the debtor, the conditions under which the assignment can be invoked against the debtor and any question whether the debtor's obligations have been discharged.

Subrogation

1. Where a person ("the creditor") has a contractual claim upon another ("the debtor"), and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, or has in fact satisfied the creditor in discharge of that duty, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether the third person is entitled to exercise against the debtor the rights which the creditor had against the debtor under the law governing their relationship and, if so, whether he may do so in full or only to a limited extent.

2. The same rule applies where several persons are subject to the same contractual claim and one of them has satisfied the creditor.

Burden of proof, etc.

1. The law governing the contract under this Convention applies to the extent that it contains, in the law of contract, rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. A contract or an act intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognized by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 9 under which that contract or act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

Exclusion of renvoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Convention means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law.

Article 16

"Ordre public"

The application of a rule of the law of any country specified by this Convention may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy ("ordre public") of the forum.

Article 17

No retrospective effect

This Convention shall apply in a Contracting State to contracts made after the date on which this Convention has entered into force with respect to that State.

Article 18

Uniform interpretation

In the interpretation and application of the preceding uniform rules, regard shall be had to their international character and to the desirability of achieving uniformity in their interpretation and application.

States with more than one legal system

1. Where a State comprises several territorial units each of which has its own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Convention.

2. A State within which different territorial units have their own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations shall not be bound to apply this Convention to conflicts solely between the laws of such units.

Precedence of Community law

This Convention shall not affect the application of provisions which, in relation to particular matters, lay down choice of law rules relating to contractual obligations and which are or will be contained in acts of the institutions of the European Communities or in national laws harmonized in implementation of such acts.

Relationship with other conventions

This Convention shall not prejudice the application of international conventions to which a Contracting State is, or becomes, a party.

Article 22

Reservations

1. Any Contracting State may, at the time of signature, ratification, acceptance or approval, reserve the right not to apply:
(a) the provisions of Article 7 (1);
(b) the provisions of Article 10 (1) (e).

2. Any Contracting State may also, when notifying an extension of the Convention in accordance with Article 27 (2), make one or more of these reservations, with its effect limited to all or some of the territories mentioned in the extension.

2. Any signatory State may, within six months from the date of the communication made to the Secretary-General, request him to arrange consultations between signatory States in order to reach agreement.

The measures taken by that State shall be brought to the knowledge of the other signatory States through the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

Article 24

However, the period of two years, referred to in paragraph 3 of that Article, shall be reduced to one year.

2. The procedure referred to in the preceding paragraph need not be followed if a Contracting State or one of the European Communities is already a party to the multilateral convention, or if its object is to revise a convention to which the State concerned is already a party, or if it is a convention concluded within the framework of the Treaties establishing the European Communities.

Article 25

(c) this Convention shall apply to the Netherlands Antilles, if the Kingdom of the Netherlands makes a declaration to that effect.

3. Such declarations may be made at any time by notifying the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

4. Proceedings brought in the United Kingdom on appeal from courts in one of the territories referred to in paragraph 2 (b) shall be deemed to be proceedings taking place in those courts.

80/383/EEC: Commission Opinion of 17 March 1980 concerning the draft Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations

COMMISSION OPINION of 17 March 1980 concerning the draft Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations (80/383/EEC)

I

The Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations was prepared between 1969 and 1979 by experts from the Governments of the Member States and from the Commission of the European Communities in consultation with the Council and the Commission. It is to be signed in 1980 by the plenipotentiaries of the Member States meeting within the Council.

The draft is the first step towards unification and codification of general rules of conflict in the field of civil law in the Community. Unification will make it easier to determine the law applicable and will increase legal certainty. It should also ensure that all courts in the Community always apply the same substantive law to the same matter in dispute between the same parties. Where the parties are free to choose between courts in different Member States, their choice should not influence the law applicable to the action, and this should operate to prevent forum shopping. The Convention is a logical complement to the Convention of 27 September 1968 on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (the Judgments Convention) (1) and to the Convention of Accession of 9 October 1978 (2) of the Kingdom of Denmark, of Ireland and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the Convention of 27 September 1968.

II

The Convention has a very wide scope of application in view of the fact that the courts of the Contracting States will always have to apply it whenever they have to decide what substantive law is applicable in an individual case, whether the choice is between the laws of several Contracting States or of several non-contracting States or of both Contracting and non-contracting States.

The uniform conflict rules created by the Convention cover in principle all types of contract. They are supplemented by special rules of conflict for certain types of contract which are contained in the Convention itself, e.g. the rules relating to contracts of carriage, or which have been adopted, or will later be adopted in Community legal instruments or in bilateral or multilateral international treaties.

The content of the Convention takes full account of the legal principles prevailing in the Member States. It has regard to developments which have taken place in case-law, legal theory and law reform in the Contracting States and outside them.

The basic rule is that the parties may themselves select the substantive law applicable to their contract except where all the elements relevant to the situation are connected with one country only. In that case, the fact that a foreign law has been chosen will not result in the exclusion of the mandatory rules of the law of that country.

If the parties have not made a choice of law, the contract is as a general rule governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected. There is a rebuttable presumption that this is the country where the party who is to perform the obligation which is characteristic of the contract has, at the time of conclusion of the contract, his habitual residence or, in the case of a legal person, its central administration.

III

The Commission welcomes the proposed unification of rules in the field of private international law and endorses the principles embodied in the Convention. It regrets, however, the fact that it has not been possible in this Convention, which is the first on private international law, to cover non-contractual obligations as well. Cases will in fact frequently occur where not only contractual but also non-contractual claims form the subject-matter of the same action. Other cases will turn on the question whether a claim is to be considered as contractual or non-contractual (delictual or quais-delictual). The application of the Convention in its present form may therefore result in the situation in which if an action is brought in one (1) OJ No L 304, 30.10.1978, p. 77 (which gives the text as amended by the Convention of Accession next referred to). (2) OJ No L 304, 30.10.1978, p. 1. Contracting State it will be decided in accordance with the rules contained in the Convention, whereas if it is brought in another Contracting State it will be decided in accordance with the conflicts rules of the lex fori which have not yet been unified. This shortcoming is, however, not so serious that the Commission would wish to oppose signature of the Convention as it stands.

IV

Much more important, however, is the fact that in a number of respects the Convention does not fully succeed in creating a set of rules common to all the Member States: 1. Entry into force in all Member States is not guaranteed. Five ratifications will be sufficient for it to enter into force (Article 28).

2. It has not been concluded for an unlimited period. Its duration may be restricted to 10 years by denunciation (Article 29).

3. Uniform interpretation of the Convention is likewise not guaranteed since the Member States have so far been unable to agree on the incorporation in the Convention, or in a Protocol corresponding to the Protocol of 3 June 1971 on the interpretation of the Judgments Convention (1), of a provision based on Article 177 of the EEC Treaty. The inclusion of such a provision would confer jurisdiction on the Court of Justice of the European Communities to give preliminary rulings concerning the interpretation of the Convention.

The defects mentioned at 1 and 2 above might have the effect of preventing the creation and maintenance of a unified juridical area within the Community. They are both fundamental defects, as a result of which the Convention cannot contribute, or can contribute only temporarily, to the functioning of the common market. Another consequence is that the rights and obligations of nationals of the Member States in intra-Community and international trade and legal transactions will continue to be dissimilar. Forum shopping will still be possible. The Convention no longer has any semblance of being a "Community convention". The close connection with the Judgments Convention does in fact require that the territorial scope of both conventions be the same.

The Convention will likewise have to be applicable in all Member States if uniform interpretation by the Court of Justice is to be guaranteed. It is of course not inconceivable, nor impossible, that the Court would interpret legal instruments that are in force only in some Member States. Nevertheless, the Community's supreme judicial authority should be able, when interpreting a rule of law, to take into account the legal position in all Member States. It is debatable whether this is still possible where a rule does not apply in all those States.

Above all, however, the absence of provisions guaranteeing uniform interpretation and conferring judisdiction for that purpose on the Court of Justice is a totally unacceptable omission in a set of legal rules which aim among other things at uniform application and development of the uniform rules now prepared. It is precisely because of its numerous framework provisions and the imprecision of many of the legal concepts employed that this Convention needs to be interpreted in a uniform manner. Past experience with other conventions has shown that, without the intervention of the Court of Justice, the same text is inevitably interpreted after a short space of time in different ways by the courts of the individual Contracting States.

The Commission has therefore repeatedly stated through its representatives that it considers the insertion of a provision based on Article 177 of the EEC Treaty to be necessary in order to guarantee uniformity of interpretation and application from the moment the Convention enters into force.

The Commission would be willing to accept that the matter be dealt with by means of a Protocol on interpretation, along the lines of the Protocol dated 3 June 1971, so that at least some national courts are empowered, or are placed under the obligation, to refer questions of interpretation to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.

The Commission would not consider it satisfactory, however, that no obligation to refer to the Court of Justice be placed on national courts from whose judgments no further appeal lies under national law ; nor would it be satisfactory that those courts be allowed discretion to determine whether they refer questions of interpretation to the Court of Justice. Consistency of case-law and uniform application of the law cannot be achieved in all Contracting States unless those courts are bound to refer to the Court of Justice. This is the only way of ensuring that the law contained in the Convention, which is a law common to all the Contracting States, is not fragmented as a result of divergent interpretation by the national courts.

(1) OJ No L 304, 30.10.1978, p. 97 (text as amended by the Convention of Accession). A restriction of the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice to the giving of rulings on questions of interpretation "in the interests of the law", which have no effect on the judgments which gave rise to the reference to the Court, would, in the Commission's opinion, be completely inadequate.

For these reasons, the Commission delivers the following opinion pursuant to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community, and in particular the second indent of Article 155 thereof: 1. The Commission favours the signature and ratification of the Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations by all Member States of the European Communities, on condition that the Governments of the Member States at least express their willingness in a joint declaration made at the time of signature of the Convention to negotiate forthwith a Protocol conferring on the Court of Justice of the European Communities powers which guarantee the uniform interpretation and application of the Convention in all Member States.

2. In the absence of such a declaration, the Commission will feel free to propose that the Council adopt a legal instrument based on the EEC Treaty to attain the desired unification of private international law and thereby eliminate the defects mentioned at IV above.

3. This opinion is addressed to the Member States.

Done at Brussels, 17 March 1980.

INTRODUCTION

1. Proposal by the Governments of the Benelux countries to the Commission of the European Communities

On 8 September 1967 the Permanent Representative of Belgium extended to the Commission, in the name of his own Government and those of the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, an invitation to collaborate with the experts of the Member States, on the basis of the draft Benelux convention, in the unification of private international law and codification of the rules of conflict of laws within the Community.

The object of this proposal was to eliminate the inconveniences arising from the diversity of the rules of conflict, notably in the field of contract law. Added to this was "an element of urgency", having regard to the reforms likely to be introduced in some Member States and the consequent "danger that the existing divergences would become more marked".

In the words of Mr T. Vogelaar, Director-General for the Internal Market and Approximation of Legislation at the Commission, in his opening address as chairman of the meeting of government experts on 26 to 28 February 1969 : "This proposal should bring about a complete unification of the rules of conflict. Thus in each of our six countries, instead of the existing rules of conflict and apart from cases of application of international Agreements binding any Member State, identical rules of conflict would enter into force both in Member States' relations inter se and in relations with non-Community States. Such a development would give rise to a common corpus of unified legal rules covering the territory of the Community's Member States. The great advantage of this proposal is undoubtedly that the level of legal certainty would be raised, confidence in the stability of legal relationships fortified, agreements on jurisdiction according to the applicable law facilitated, and the protection of rights acquired over the whole field of private law augmented. Compared with the unification of substantive law, unification of the rules of conflict of laws is more practicable, especially in the field of property law, because the rules of conflict apply solely to legal relations involving an international element" (1).

2. Examination of the proposal by the Commission and its consequences

In examining the proposal by the Benelux countries the Commission arrived at the conclusion that at least in some special fields of private international law the harmonization of rules of conflict would be likely to facilitate the workings of the common market.

Mr Vogelaar's opening address reviews the grounds on which the Commission's conclusion was founded and is worth repeating here:

> "According to both the letter and spirit of the Treaty establishing the EEC, harmonization is recognized as fulfilling the function of permitting or facilitating the creation in the economic field of legal conditions similar to those governing an internal market. I appreciate that opinions may differ as to the precise delimitation of the inequalities which directly affect the functioning of the common market and those having only an indirect effect. Yet there are still legal fields in which the differences between national legal systems and the lack of unified rules of conflict definitely impede the free movement of persons, goods, services and capital among the Member States.

Some will give preference to the harmonization or unification of substantive law rather than the harmonization of rules of conflict. As we know, the former has already been achieved in various fields. However, harmonization of substantive law does not always contrive to keep pace with the dismantling of economic frontiers. The problem of the law to be applied will therefore continue to arise as long as substantive law is not unified. The number of cases in which the question of applicable law must be resolved increases with the growth of private law relationships across frontiers.

At the same time there will be a growing number of cases in which the courts have to apply a foreign-law. The Convention signed on 27 September 1968 on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters uniformly governs the international jurisdiction of the courts within the Community. It should help to facilitate and expedite many civil actions and enforcement proceedings. It also enables the parties. in many matters, to teach agreements assigning jurisdiction and to choose among several courts. The outcome may be that preference is given to the court of a State whose law seems to offer a better solution to the proceedings. To prevent this "forum shopping", increase legal certainty, and anticipate more easily the law which will be applied, it would be advisable for the rules of conflict to be unified in fields of particular economic importance so that the same law is applied irrespective of the State in which the decision is given.

To sum up, there are three main considerations guiding our proposal for harmonizing the rules of conflict for a few well-defined types of legal relations. The first is dictated by the history of private international law : to try to unify everything is to attempt too much and would take too long. The second is the urgent necessity for greater legal certainty in some sectors of major economic importance. the third is the wish to forestall any aggravation of the differences between the rules of private international law of the various Member States' (2).

These were in fact the motives which prompted the Commission to convene a meeting of experts from the Member States in order to obtain a complete picture of the present state of the law and to decide whether and to what extent a harmonization or unification of private international law within the Community should be undertaken. The invitation was accompanied by a questionnaire designed to facilitate the discussion (3).

3. Favourable attitude of Member States to the search for uniform rules of conflict, the setting of priorities and establishment of the working group to study and work out these rules

The meeting in question took place on 26 to 28 February 1969. It produced a first survey of the situation with regard to prospects for and possible advantage of work in the field of unification of rules of conflict among Member States of the European Communities (4).

However, it was not until the next meeting on 20 to 22 October 1969 that the government experts were able to give a precise opinion both on the advisability and scope of harmonization and on the working procedure and organization of work.

As regards advisability of harmonization the Member States' delegations (with the sole exception of the German delegation) declared themselves to be fundamentally in agreement on the value of the work in making the law more certain in the Community. The German delegation, while mentioning some hesitation on this point in professional and business circles, said that this difference of opinion was not such as to affect the course of the work at the present time.

As regards the scope of harmonization, it was recognized (without prejudice to future developments) that a start should be made on matters most closely involved in the proper functioning of the common market, more specifically: 1. the law applicable to corporeal and incorporeal property;

2. the law applicable to contractual and non-contractual obligations;

3. the law applicable to the form of legal transactions and evidence;

4. general matters under the foregoing heads (renvoi, classification, application of foreign law, acquired rights, public policy, capacity, representation).

As for the legal basis of the work, it was the unanimous view that the proposed harmonization, without being specifically connected with the provisions of Article 220 of the EEC Treaty, would be a natural sequel to the Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments.

Lastly, on the procedure to be followed, all the delegations were in favour of that adopted for work on the Conventions already signed or in process of drafting under Article 220 and of seeking the most suitable ways of expediting the work (5).

The results of the meeting were submitted through the Directorate-General for the Internal Market an Approximation of Legislation to the Commission with a proposal to seek the agreement of Member States for continuance of the work and preparation of a preliminary draft Convention establishing uniformity of law in certain relevant areas of private international law.

The Commission acceded to the proposal. At its meeting on 15 January 1970 the Committee of Permanent Representatives expressly authorized the Group to continue its work on harmonization of the rules of private international law, on the understanding that the preliminary draft or drafts would give priority to the four areas previously indicated.

Following the abovementioned decision of the Permanent Representatives Committee, the Group met on 2 and 3 February 1970 and elected its chairman, Mr P. Jenard, Director of Administration in the Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and External Trade, and its vice-chairman, Prof. Miccio, Counsellor to the Italian Court of Cassation.

Having regard to the decision of the previous meeting that the matters to be given priority should be divided into four sectors, the Group adopted the principle that each of the four sectors should have its own rapporteur appointed as follows, to speed up the work: 1. in the case of the law applicable to corporeal and incorporeal property, by the German delegation;

2. in the case of the law applicable to contractual and extracontractual obligations, by the Italian delegation:

3. in the case of the law applicable to the form of legal transactions and evidence, by the French delegation;

4. in general matters, by the Netherlands delegation, in agreement with the Belgian and Luxembourg delegations.

As a result the following were appointed : Prof. K. Arndt, Oberlandsgerichtspräsident a.d. ; Prof. M. Giuliano, University of Milan ; Prof. P. Lagarde, University of Paris I ; Mr T. van Sasse van Ysselt, Director in the Netherlands Ministry of Justice.

Other matters were dealt with at the same meeting, notably the kind of cenvention to be prepared, as to which the great majority of delegates favoured a universal convention not based upon reciprocity ; the method of work ; participation of observers from the Hague Conference on Private International Law and the Benelux Commission on Unification of Law (6).

4. Organization, progress and initial results of the Group's work at the end of 1972

The Group took as its starting point the examination and discussion of the questionnaires prepared by the rapporteurs, Messrs Giuliano, Lagarde and van Sasse van Ysselt in their respective fields. They were discussed at a meeting of the rapporteurs chaired by Mr Jenard on 1 to 4 June 1970. The three questionnaires were subjected to a thorough analysis, extending both to the rules of conflict (national or established by convention) in force in the Community Member States and to the evolutionary trends already apparent in case law and legal theory in certain countries or worthy of consideration in relation to certain present-day reqirements in international life. This oral analysis was further supplemented by the written replies given by each rapporteur on the basis of the statutes, case law and legal theory of his own country (of the three Benelux countries in the case of Mr van Sasse) to the questionnaires drawn up by his colleagues and himself (7).

This preliminary work and material enabled each of the rapporteurs to present an interim report, with draft articles on the matter considered, as a working basis for the Group meetings. It was agreed that these meetings would be devoted to an examination of Mr Giuliano's report on the law applicable to contractual and non-contractual obligations and to the subject matter of Mr Lagarde's and Mr van Sasse van Ysselt's report to the extent that this was relevant to Mr Giuliano's subject.

It was agreed that Mr Arndt's report on the law applicable to corporeal and incorporeal property would be discussed later, Mr Arndt having explained that a comparative study of the principal laws on security rights and interests should precede his report and that the need for such a study had been generally recognized.

Apart from the meeting of rapporteurs in June 1970, the work fully occupied 11 Group plenary sessions, each with an average duration of five days (8).

At its meeting in June 1972 the Group completed the preliminary draft convention on the law applicable to contractual and non-contractual obligations and decided that it should be submitted, together with the reports finalized at a meeting of rapporteurs on 27 and 28 September 1972, to the Permanent Representatives Commitee for transmission to the Governments of the Community Member States (9).

5. Re-examination of Group work in the light of observations by the Governments of original and new Member States of the EEC and results achieved in February 1979

It follows from the foregoing observations that the 1972 draft dealt both with the law applicable to contractual obligations and with that applicable to non-contractual obligations. At the same time it provided solutions relating to the law governing the form of legal transactions and evidence, questions of interpretation of uniform rules and their relationship with other rules of conflict of international origin, to the extent to which these were connected with the subject of the preliminary draft.

Following the accession of the United Kingdom, Denmark and Ireland to the EEC in 1973 the Commission extended the Group to include government experts from the new Member States and the Permanent Representatives Commitee authorized the enlarged Group to re-examine in the light of observations from the Governments of the original and of the new Member States of the EEC, the preliminary draft convention which the Commission had submitted to it at the end of 1972. The Group elected Prof. Philip as vice-chairman.

Nevertheless the preliminary draft was not re-examined immediately. The need to allow the experts from the new Member States time to consult their respective Governments and interested parties on the one hand and the political uncertainties in the United Kingdom concerning membership of the European Communities (which were not settled until the 1975 referendum) on the other, resulted in a significant reduction (if not suspension) of the Group's activities for about three years. It was not until the end of 1975 that the Group was able properly to resume its work and proceed with the preparation of the Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations. In fact the Group decided at its meeting in March 1978 to limit the present convention to contracts alone and to begin negotiations for a second Convention, on non-contractual obligations, after the first had been worked out. Most delegations thought it better for reasons of time to finish the part relating to contractual obligations first.

The original preliminary draft, with the limitation referred to, was re-examined in the course of 14 plenary sessions of the Group and three special meetings on transport and insurance contracts ; each of the plenary sessions lasted two to five days (10). At the meeting in February 1979 the Group finished the draft convention, decided upon the procedure for transmitting the draft to the Council before the end of April and instructed Professors Giuliano and Lagarde to draw up the report ; this was then finalized at a meeting of rapporteurs on 18 to 20 June 1979 in which one expert per delegation participated, and transmitted in turn to the Council and to the Governments by the chairman, Mr Jenard.

6. Finalization of the Convention within the Council of the European Communitees

On 18 May 1979 the Group's chairman, Mr Jenard, sent the draft Convention to the President of the Council of the European Communities with a request that the Governments make their comments on the draft by the end of the year so that the Convention could then be concluded during 1980.

On 20 July 1979 Mr Jenard sent the President of the Council a draft report on the Convention, which was the predecessor of this report.

The General Secretariat of the Council received written comments from the Belgian, Netherlands, Danish, Irish, German, Luxembourg and United Kingdom Governments. In addition, on 17 March 1980, the Commission adopted an opinion on the draft Convention, which was published in Official Journal of the European Communities No L 94 of 11 April 1980.

On 16 January 1980 the Permanent Representatives Commitee set up an ad hoc working party on private international law, whose terms of reference were twofold: - to finalize the Convention text in the light of the comments made by Member States' Governments,

- to consider whether, and if so within what limits, the Court of Justice of the European Communities should be given jurisdiction to interpret the Convention.

The ad hoc working party met twice, from 24 to 28 March and 21 to 25 April 1980, with Mr Brancaccio from the Italian Ministry of Justice in the chair (11). Working from the Governments' written comments and others made orally during discussions, the working party reached general agreement on the substantive provisions of the Convention and on the accompanying report.

The only problems unresolved by the working party concerned the problem of where the Convention stood in relation to the Community legal order. They arose in particular in determining the number of ratifications required for the Convention to come into force and in drafting a statement by the Governments of the Member States on the conferral of jurisdiction on the Court of Justice.

Following a number of discussions in the Permanent Representatives Committee, which gradually brought agreement within sight, the Council Presidency deemed circumstances to be ripe politically for the points of disagreement to be discussed by the Ministers of Justice with a good chance of success at a special Council meeting on 19 June 1980 in Rome.

At that meeting, a final round of negotiations produced agreement on a number of seven Member States required to ratify in order for the Convention to come into force. Agreement was also reached on the wording of a joint statement on the interpretation of the Convention by the Court of Justice, which followed word for word the matching statement made by the Governments of the original six Member States of the Community when the Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement was concluded on 27 September 1968 in Brussels. In adopting the statement, the Representatives of Governments of the Member States, meeting within the Council, also instructed the ad hoc Council working party on private international law to consider by what means point 1 of the statement could be implemented and report back by 30 June 1981.

With these points settled, the President-in-Office of the Council, Tommaso Morlino, Italian Minister of Justice, recorded the agreement of the Representatives of the Governments of the Member States, meeting within the Council, on the following: - adoption of the text of the Convention and of the two joint statements annexed to it,

- the Convention would be open for signing from 19 June 1980,

- the Convention and accompanying report would be published in the Official Journal of the European Communities for information.

The Convention was signed on 19 June 1980 by the plenipotentiaries of Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

7. Review of the internal sources and nature of the rules in force in the EEC Member States relating to the law applicable to contractual obligations

The chief aim of the Convention is to introduce into the national laws of the EEC Member States a set of uniform rules on the law applicable to contractual obligations and on certain general points of private international law to the extent that these are linked with those obligations.

Without going here into details of positive law, though it may be necessary to return to it in the comments on the uniform rules, a short survey can now be given of the internal sources and the nature of the rules of conflict at present in force in the Community countries in the field covered by the Convention. This survey will bring out both the value and the difficulties of the unification undertaken by the Group and of which the convention is only the first fruit.

Of the nine Member States of the Community, Italy is the only one to have a set of rules of conflict enacted by the legislature covering almost all the matters with which the Convention is concerned. These rules are to be found for the most part in the second paragraph of Article 17 and in Articles 25, 26, 30 and 31 of the general provisions constituting the introduction to the 1942 Civil Code, and in Articles 9 and 10 of the 1942 Navigation Code.

In the other Member States of the Community, however, the body of rules of conflict on the law applicable to contractual obligations is founded only on customary rules or on rules originating in case law. Academic studies and writings have helped considerably to develop and harmonize these rules.

The position as just stated has not been altered substantially either by the French draft law supplementing the Civil Code in respect of private international law (1967) or by the Benelux Treaty establishing uniform rules of private international law signed in Brussels on 3 July 1969. These two texts are certainly an interesting attempt to codify the rules of conflict and also, in the case of the Benelux countries, to make these rules uniform on an inter-State level. The Group did not fail to take account of their results in its own work. However, the entry into force of the Benelux Treaty has not been pursued, and the French draft law seems unlikely to be adopted in the near future.

8. Universal application of the uniform rules

From the very beginning of its work the Group has professed itself to be in favour of uniform rules which would apply not only to the nationals of Member States and to persons domiciled or resident within the Community but also to the nationals of third States and to persons domiciled or resident therein. The provisions of Article 2 specify the universal application of the convention.

The Group took the view that its main purpose was to frame general rules such as those existing in legislative provisions currently in force in Italy and in the Benelux Treaty and the French draft law. In such a context these general rules, which would become the "common law" of each Member State for settling conflicts of laws, would not prejudice the detailed regulation of clearly delimited matters arising from other work, especially that of the Hague Conference on private international law. The application of these particular conventions is safeguarded by the provisions of Article 21.

9. On the normally general nature of the uniform rules in the Convention and their significance in the unification of laws already undertaken in the field of private international law

At the outset of its work the Group had also to determine the nature and scope of the uniform rules of conflict to be formulated. Should they be general rules, to be applied indiscriminately to all contracts, or would it be better to regulate contractual obligations by means of a series of specific rules applicable to the various categories of contract, or again should an intermediate solution be envisaged, namely by adopting general rules and supplementing them by specific rules for certain categories of contract?

Initially the rapporteur advocated the latter method. This provided that, in default of an express of implied choice by the parties, the contract would be governed (subject to specific provisions for certain categories) by one system of law.

When the Group tackled the question of whether to supplement the general rules for determining the law applicable to the contract by some specific rules for certain categories of contract it became clear that the point was no longer as significant as it had been in the context of the rapporteur's initial proposals. The Group's final version of the text of Article 4 provided satisfactory solutions for most of the contracts whose applicable law was the subject of specific rules of conflict in the rapporteur's proposals, notably because of its flexibility. The Group therefore merely provided for some exceptions to the rule contained in Article 4, notably those in Articles 5 and 6 concerning the law applicable respectively to certain consumer contracts and to contracts of employment in default of an express or implied choice by the parties.

The normally general nature of the uniform rules made it necessary to provide for a few exceptions and to allow the judge a certain discretion as to their application in each particular case. This aspect will be dealt with in the comments on a number of Articles in Chapter III of this report.

As declared in the Preamble, in concluding this Convention the nine States which are parties to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community show their desire to continue in the field of private international law the work of unification already undertaken in the Community, particularly in matters of jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments. The question of accession by third States is not dealt with in the Convention (see page 41, penultimate paragraph).

TITLE I SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

Article 1

Scope of the Convention

1. As provided in Article 1 (1) the uniform rules in this Convention apply generally to contractual obligations in situations involving a conflict of laws.

It must be stressed that the uniform rules apply to the abovementioned obligations only "in situations involving a choice between the laws of different countries". The purpose of this provision is to define the true aims of the uniform rules. We know that the law applicable to contracts and to the obligations arising from them is not always that of the country where the problems of interpretation or enforcement are in issue. There are situations in which this law is not regarded by the legislature or by the case law as that best suited to govern the contract and the obligations resulting from it. These are situations which involve one or more elements foreign to the internal social system of a country (for example, the fact that one or all of the parties to the contract are foreign nationals or persons habitually resident abroad, the fact that the contract was made abroad, the fact that one or more of the obligations of the parties are to be performed in a foreign country, etc.), thereby giving the legal systems of several countries claims to apply. These are precisely the situations in which the uniform rules are intended to apply.

Moreover the present wording of paragraph 1 means that the uniform rules are to apply in all cases where the dispute would give rise to a conflict between two or more legal systems. The uniform rules also apply if those systems coexist within one State (cf. Article 19 (1)). Therefore the question whether a contract is governed by English or Scots law is within the scope of the Convention, subject to Article 19 (2).

2. The principle embodied in paragraph 1 is however subject to a number of restrictions.

First, since the Convention is concerned only with the law applicable to contractual obligations, property rights and intellectual property are not covered by these provisions. An Article in the original preliminary draft had expressly so provided. However, the Group considered that such a provision would be superfluous in the present text, especially as this would have involved the need to recapitulate the differences existing as between the various legal system of the Member States of the Community.

3. There are also the restrictions set out in paragraph 2 of Article 1.

The first of these, at (a), is the status or legal capacity of natural persons, subject to Article 11 ; then, at (b), contractual obligations relating to wills and succession, to property rights arising out of matrimonial relationships, to rights and duties arising out of family relationships, parentage, marriage or affinity, including maintenance obligations in respect of illegitimate children. The Group intended this enumeration to exclude from the scope of the Convention all matters of family law.

As regards maintenance obligations, within the meaning of Article 1 of the Hague Convention on the law applicable to maintenance obligations, the Group considered that this exclusion should also extend to contracts which parties unter a legal maintenance obligation make in performance of that obligation. All other contractual obligations, even if they provide for the maintenance of a member of the family towards whom there are no legal maintenance obligations, would fall within the scope of the Convention.

Contrary to the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 1 in the original preliminary draft, the current wording of subparagraph (b) does not in general exclude gifts. Most of the delegations favoured the inclusion of gifts where they arise from a contract within the scope of the Convention, even when made within the family, provided they are not covered by family law. Therefore the only contractual gifts left outside the scope of the uniform rules are those to which family law, the law relating to matrimonial property rights or the law of succession apply.

The Group unanimously affirmed that matters relating to the custody of children are outside the scope of the Convention, since they fall within the sphere of personal status and capacity. However, the Group thought it inappropriate to specify this exclusion in the text of the Convention itself, thereby intending to avoid an a contrario interpretation of the Convention of 27 September 1968.

To obviate any possibility of misconstruction, the present wording of subparagraphs (a) and (b) uses the same terminology as the 1968 Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments.

4. Subparagraph (c) excludes from the scope of the uniform rules in the first instance obligations arising from bills of exchange, cheques, promissary notes.

In retaining this exclusion, for which provision had already been made in the original preliminary draft, the Group took the view that the provisions of the Convention were not suited to the regulation of obligations of this kind. Their inclusion would have involved rather complicated special rules. Moreover the Geneva Conventions to which several Member States of the Community are parties govern most of these areas. Also, certain Member States of the Community regard these obligations as non-contractual.

Subparagraph (c) also excludes other negotiable instruments to the extent that the obligations under such other negotiable instruments arise out of their negotiable character. If a document, though the obligation under it is transferable, is not regarded as a negotiable instrument, it falls outside the exclusion. This has the effect that such documents as bills of lading, similar documents issued in connection with transport contracts, and bonds, debentures, guarantees, letters of indemnity, certificates of deposit, warrants and warehouse receipts are only excluded by subparagraph (c) if, they can be regarded as negotiable instruments ; and even then the exclusion only applies with regard to obligations arising out of their negotiable character. Furthermore, neither the contracts pursuant to which such instruments are issued nor contracts for the purchase and sale of such instruments are excluded. Whether a document is characterized as a negotiable instrument is not governed by this Convention and is a matter for the law of the forum (including its rules of private international law).

5. Arbitration agreements and agreements on the choice of court are likewise excluded from the scope of the Convention (subparagraph (d)).

There was a lively debate in the Group on whether or not to exclude agreements on the choice of court. The majority in the end favoured exclusion for the following reasons : the matter lies within the sphere of procedure and forms part of the administration of justice (exercise of State authority) ; rules on this matter might have endangered the ratification of the Convention. It was also noted that rules on jurisdiction are a matter of public policy and there is only marginal scope for freedom of contract. Each court is obliged to determine the validity of the agreement on the choice of court in relation to its own law, not in relation to the law chosen. Given the nature of these provisions and their fundamental diversity, no rule of conflict can lead to a uniform solution. Moreover, these rules would in any case be frustated if the disputes were brought before a court in a third country. It was also pointed out that so far as concerns relationships within the Community, the most important matters (valitidity of the clause and form) are governed by Article 17 of the Convention of 27 September 1968. The outstanding points, notably those relating to consent, do not arise in practice, having regard to the fact that Article 17 provides that these agreements shall be in writing. Those delegations who thought that agreements on choice of court should be included within the Convention pointed out that the validity of such an agreement would often be dealt with by the application of the same law that governed the rest of the contract in which the agreement was included and should therefore be governed by the same law as the contract. In some systems of law, agreement as to choice of court is itself regarded as a contract and the ordinary choice of law rules are applied to discover the law applicable to such a contract.

As regards arbitration agreements, certain delegations, notably the United Kingdom delegation, had proposed that these should not be excluded from the Convention. It was emphasized that an arbitration agreement does not differ from other agreements as regards the contractual aspects, and that certain international Conventions do not regulate the law applicable to arbitration agreements, while others are inadequate in this respect. Moreover the international Conventions have not been ratified by all the Member States of the Community and, even if they had been, the problem would not be solved because these Conventions are not of universal applications. It was added that there would not be unification within the Community on this important matter in international commerce.

Other delegations, notably the German and French delegations, opposed the United Kingdom proposal, emphasizing particularly that any increase in the number of conventions in this area should be avoided, that severability is accepted in principle in the draft and the arbitration clause is independent, that the concept of "closest ties" difficult to apply to arbitration agreements, that procedural and contractual aspects are difficult to separate, that the matter is complex and the experts' proposals show great divergences ; that since procedural matters and those relating to the question whether a dispute was arbitrable would in any case be excluded, the only matter to be regulated would be consent ; that the International Chamber of Commerce - which, as everyone knows, has great experience in this matter - has not felt the need for further regulation.

Having regard to the fact that the solutions which can and have been considered generally for arbitration are very complex and show great disparity, a delegate proposed that this matter should be studied separately and any results embodied in a Protocol. The Group adopted this proposal and consequently excluded arbitration agreements from the scope of the uniform rules, subject to returning to an examination of these problems and of agreements on the choice of court once the Convention has been finally drawn up.

The exclusion of arbitration agreements does not relate solely to the procedural aspects, but also to the formation, validity and effects of such agreements. Where the arbitration clause forms an integral part of a contract, the exclusion relates only to the clause itself and not to the contract as a whole. This exclusion does not prevent such clauses being taken into consideration for the purposes of Article 3 (1).

6. Subparagraph (e) provides that the uniform rules shall not apply to questions governed by the law of companies, and other bodies corporate or unincorporate such as the creation, by registration or otherwise, legal capacity, internal organization or winding-up of companies, and other bodies corporate or unincorporate and the personal legal liability of officers and members as such for the obligations of the company or body.

This exclusion in no way implies that this aspect was considered unimportant in the economic life of the Member States of the Community. Indeed, this is an area which, by virtue of its economic importance and the place which it occupies in many provisions of the Treaty establishing the EEC, appears to have the strongest possible reasons for not being separated from Community work in the filed of unification of private international law, notably in conflicts of laws pertaining to economic relations.

Notwithstanding the foregoing considerations, the Group had thought it inadvisable, even in the original preliminary draft, to include companies, firms and legal persons within the scope of the Convention, especially in view of the work being done on this subject within the European Communities (12).

Confirming this exclusion, the Group stated that it affects all the complex acts (contractual, administrative, registration) which are necessary to the creation of a company or firm and to the regulation of its internal organization and winding-up, i.e. acts which fall within the scope of company law.

On the other hand, acts or preliminary contracts whose sole purpose is to create obligations between interested parties (promoters) with a view to forming a company or firm are not covered by the exclusion.

The subject may be a body with or without legal personality, profit-making or non-profit-making. Having regard to the differences which exist, it may be that certain relationships will be regarded as within the scope of company law or might be treated as being governed by that law (for example, société de droit civil, nicht-rechtsfähiger Verein, partnership, Vennootschap onder firma, etc.) in some countries but not in others. The rule has been made flexible in order to take account of the diversity of national laws.

Examples of "internal organization" are : the calling of meetings, the right to vote, the necessary quorum, the appointment of officers of the company or firm, etc. "Winding-up" would cover either the termination of the company or firm as provided by its constitution or by operation of law, or its disappearance by merger or other similar process.

At the request of the German delegation the Group extended the subparagraph (e) exclusion to the personal liability of members and organs, and also to the legal capacity of companies or firms. On the other hand the Group did not adopt the proposal that mergers and groupings should also be expressly mentioned, most of the delegations being of the opinion that mergers and groupings were already covered by the present wording.

As regards legal capacity, it should be made clear that the reference is to limitations, which may be imposed by law on companies and firms, for example in respect of acquisition of immovable property, not to ultra vires acts by organs of the company or firm, which fall under subparagraph (f).

7. The solution adopted in subparagraph (f) involves the exclusion from the scope of the uniform rules of the question whether an agent is able to bind a principal, or an organ to bind a company or body corporate or unincorporate, to a third party.

The exclusion affects only the relationships between the principial and third parties, more particularly the question whether the principal is bound vis-à-vis third parties by the acts of the agent in specific cases. It does not affect other aspects of the complex field of agency, which also extends to relationships between the principal and the agent and to agent-third party relationships. The exclusion is justified by the fact that it is difficult to accept the principle of freedom of contract on this point. On the other hand, principal-agent and agent-third party relationships in no way differ from other obligations and are therefore included within the scope of the Convention in so far as they are of a contractual nature.

8. The exception in subparagraph (g) concerns "trusts" in the sense in which they are understood in the common law countries. The English word "trust" is properly used to define the scope of the exclusion. On the other hand similar institutions under continental laws falls within the provisions of the Convention because they are normally contractual in origin. Nevertheless it will be open to the judge to treat them in the same way as the institutions of the common law countries when they exhibit the same characteristics.

9. Under subparagraph (h) the uniform rules do not apply to evidence and procedure, subject to Article 14.

This exclusion seems to require no comment. The scope and extent to which the exclusion is subject to limitation will be noted in the commentary on Article 14.

10. The question whether contracts of insurance should or should not be included in the sope of the uniform rules was discussed at length by the Group. The solution finally adopted was that which appears in paragraph 3.

Under this paragraph the provisions of the Convention do not apply to contracts of insurance covering risks situated in the territories of Member States of the European Economic Community. This exclusion takes account of work being done within the Community in the field of insurance. Thus the uniform rules apply to contracts of insurance covering risks situate outside those territories. The States are nevertheless free to apply rules based on those in the Convention even to risks situate in the Community, subject to the Community rules which are to be established.

Insurance contracts, where they cover risks situate outside the Community, may also, in appropriate cases, fall under Article 5 of the Convention.

To determine whether a risk is situate in the territories of the Member States of the Community the last phrase of paragraph 3 states that the judge is required to apply his own national law. This expression means the rules in force in the judge's country, to the exclusion of the rules of private international law as stated by Article 15 of the Convention.

11. By virtue of paragraph 4 of Article 1 the exclusion provided for in paragraph 3 does not affect reinsurance contracts. In fact these contracts do not raise the same problems as contracts of insurance, where the need to protect the persons insured must necessarily be taken into account. Thus the uniform rules apply to reinsurance contracts.

Application of law of non-Contracting States

This Article underlines the universal character of the uniform rules laid down in this Convention. The Convention does not apply only in situations involving some form of connection with one or other of the Contracting States. It is of universal application in the sense that the choice of law which it lays down may result in the law of a State not party to the Convention being applied. By way of example, under Article 3, parties to a contract may opt for the law of a third State, and in the absence of any choice, that same law may be applied to the contract under Articles 4 and 5 if it is with that State that the contract has the closest links. In other words, the Convention is a uniform measure of private international law which will replace the rules of private international law in force in each of the Contracting States, with regard to the subject matter which it covers and subject to any other convention to which the Contracting States are party (see Article 21).

The solution is consistent with that adopted in most of the Hague Conventions on private international law that deal with choice of laws (stricto sensu). The text follows that of the Hague Convention drafted during the XIIIth session (Conventions of 14 March 1978 on the law applicable to matrimonial property regimes, Article 2, and on the law applicable to agency, Article 4).

TITLE II UNIFORM RULES

Freedom of choice

1. The rule stated in Article 3 (1) under which the contract is governed by the law chosen by the parties simply reaffirms a rule currently embodied in the private international law of all the Member States of the Community and of most other countries.

In French law the rule conferring this power (or "autonomie de la volonté" as it is called) upon the parties is founded on case law dating back to the judgment delivered on 5 December 1910 by the Court of Cassation in American Trading Company v. Quebec Steamship Company Limited. The French draft law of 1967 to supplement the Civil Code in matters of private international law merely confirms the state of French law in this matter by providing in the first paragraph of Article 2312 : "Contracts of an international character and the obligations arising from them shall be subject to the law under which the parties intended to place themselves."

The firm establishment of the rule in French case law was accompanied by corresponding developments in legal theory. The most eminent contemporary writers declare themselves fundamentally in favour of the principle of the parties' freedom of contract in determining the law applicable to the contract, or, according to the opinion of some legal writers, the "localization" of the contract in a specific legal system (13).

The same applies to the law of the German Federal Republic, where the subject of contractual obligations was not dealt with by the legislature in the final version of the "introductory law" of 1896. The rule conferring upon the parties the power to specify the law applicable to their contract is nevertheless founded on case law which has been developed and strengthened in recent decades despite the opposition of the great majority of earlier German legal theorists. At all events present-day theory is in entire agreement with the position taken by the case law (14).

Unlike the situation in France and Germany, in Italy the principle of freedom of contract of the contracting parties was expressly enacted as early as 1865 in the preliminary provisions of the Civil Code. It is currently based upon the first paragraph of Article 25 of the preliminary provisions of the 1942 Civil Code, in which the freedom of the parties to choose the law applicable to their contract is formally accepted, as in Articles 9 and 10 of the Navigation Code, where it is provided that the power of the parties to designate the applicable law may also be exercised in seamen's contracts and in contracts fot the use of ships, boats and aircraft. According to the preponderant view of theorists and consistent decisions by the Court of Cassation, the law applicable to the contract must be determined primarily on the basis of the express will of the parties ; only in default of such a nomination will the law of the contract be determined by the connecting factors stipulated in the abovementioned provisions (15).

As regards Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands, the rule that the contracting parties enjoy freedom of contract in choosing the applicable law has also been sanctioned by judicial practice and by contemporary legal writers.

In its judgment of 24 February 1938 in SA Antwerpia v. Ville d'Anvers the Belgian Court of Cassation stated for the first time, in terms clearly suggested by the French judgment of 5 December 1910, that : "the law applicable to contracts, both to their formation and their conditions and effects, (is) that adopted by the parties" (16). Several Belgian writers have contributed to the firm establishment of the rule in theory and in practice (17).

In the Netherlands the Hoge Raad put the finishing touches to the developments in case law in this field in its judgment of 13 May 1966 in the Alnati case. The previous decisions of the Supreme Court and the differing views of writers on the precise scope of the freedom of contract rule would not have permitted definition of the state of Netherlands law in this matter with sufficient certainty (18).

At all events the 1969 Benelux Treaty on uniform rules for private international law, even though the signatory States have not pursued its entry into force, is clear evidence of their present views on this subject. Article 13 (1) of the uniform law states : "Contracts shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties as regards both essential and ancillary provisions".

English law recognizes that the parties to a contract are free to choose the law which is to govern it ("the proper law of the contract"). This principle of freedom of choice is founded on judicial decisions (19). In Vita Food Products Inc. v. Unus Shipping Co. Ltd (20) Lord Wright indicated that the parties' choice must be bona fide and legal and could be avoided on the ground of public policy. In certain areas the parties' freedom of choice is subject to limitations imposed by statute (20a), the most important of these being in the field of exemption clauses (20b).

The law of Scotland is to similar effect (20c) and Irish law draws its inspiration from the same principles as the English and Scottish legal systems.

Under English law (and the situation is similar in Scots law and Irish law), in the case where the parties have not expressly chosen the law to govern their contract (20d), the court will consider whether the parties' choice of law to be applied can be inferred from the terms of the contract. The most common case in which the court may infer a choice of the proper law is where the contract contains an arbitration or choice of jurisdiction clause naming a particular country as the seat of arbitration or litigation. Such a clause gives rise to an argument that the law of the country chosen should be applied as the proper law of the contract. This inference however is not conclusive and can be rebutted by any contrary inferences which may be drawn from the other provisions of the contract and the relevant surrounding circumstances (20e).

Finally, as regards Denmark, the principle of the freedom of contracting parties to choose the law applicable to their contract already seems to have inspired several opinions by Supreme Court judges during this century. Today at all events this principle forms the basis of Danish case law, as can be seen from the judgment in 1957 in Baltica v.M.J. Vermaas Scheepvaart bedrijf, with full support from legal writers (21).

2. The principle of the parties' freedom to choose the law applicable is also supported both by arbitration decisions and by international treaties designed to unify certain rules of conflict in relation to contracts.

The rule, which had already been cited in 1929 by the Permanent Court of International Justice in its judgment in the case of the Brazilian Loans (22), very clearly underlay the award made by the arbitration tribunal on 29 August 1958 in Saudi Arabia v. Arabian American Oil Company (Aramco) in which it was stated that the "principles of private international law to be consulted in order to find the law applicable are those relating to freedom of choice, by virtue of which, in an agreement which is international in character, the law expressly chosen by the parties must be applied first..." (23). Similarly in the arbitration findings given on 15 March 1963 in Sapphire International Petroleums Ltd v. National Iranian Oil Company, the sole arbitrator, Mr Cavin, affirmed that it is the will of the parties that determines the law applicable in matters of contract (24). The rule was reaffirmed even more recently by the sole arbitrator, Mr Dupuy, in the award which he made on 19 January 1977 in Libyan Arab Republic v. California Asiatic Oil Company and Texaco Overseas Petroleum Company (25).

As regards international treaties, the rule of freedom of choice has been adopted in the Convention on the law applicable to international sales of goods concluded at the Hague on 15 June 1955 which entered into force on 1 September 1964. Article 2 of this Convention, which is in force among several European countries, provides that : "The sale shall be governed by the internal law of the country nominated by the contracting parties."

Article VIII of the European Convention on international commercial arbitration concluded at Geneva on 21 April 1961, which entered into force on 7 January 1964, provides that the parties are free to determine the law which the arbitrators must apply in a dispute.

The same principle forms the basis of the 1965 Convention for the settlement of disputes relating to investments between States and nationals of other States, which entered into force on 14 October 1966, when it provides in Article 42 that "the Tribunal shall rule on the dispute in accordance with the rules of law adopted by the parties".

The Hague Convention of 14 March 1978 on the law applicable to agency provides in Article 5 that "the internal law chosen by the principal and the agent is to govern the agency relationship between them" (26).

3. The parties' choice must be express or be demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the terms of the contract or the circumstances of the case. This interpretation, which emerges from the second sentence of Article 3 (1), has an important consequence.

The choice of law by the parties will often be express but the Convention recognizes the possibility that the Court may, in the light of all the facts, find that the parties have made a real choice of law although this is not expressly stated in the contract. For example, the contract may be in a standard form which is known to be governed by a particular system of law even though there is no express statement to this effect, such as a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance. In other cases a previous course of dealing between the parties under contracts containing an express choice of law may leave the court in no doubt that the contract in question is to be governed by the law previously chosen where the choice of law clause has been omitted in circumstances which do not indicate a deliberate change of policy by the parties. In some cases the choice of a particular forum may show in no uncertain manner that the parties intend the contract to be governed by the law of that forum, but this must always be subject to the other terms of the cntract and all the circumstances of the case. Similarly references in a contract to specific Articles of the French Civil Code may leave the court in no doubt that the parties have deliberately chosen French law, although there is no expressly stated choice of law. Other matters that may impel the court to the conclusion that a real choice of law has been made might include an express choice of law in related transactions between the same parties, or the choice of a place where disputes are to be settled by arbitration in circumstances indicating that the arbitrator should apply the law of that place.

This Article does not permit the court to infer a choice of law that the parties might have made where they had no clear intention of making a choice. Such a situation is governed by Article 4.

4. The last sentence of Article 3 (1) acknowledges that the parties' choice of the law applicable may relate to the whole of the contract or to only part thereof. On the question whether severability (dépeçage) was to be allowed, some experts observed that the contract should in principle be governed by one law, unless that contract, although apparently a single contract, consists in reality of several contracts or parts which are separable and independent of each other from the legal and economic points of view. In the opinion of these experts, no reference to severability should have been made in the text of the Convention itself. In the view of others, on the contrary, severability is directly linked with the principle of freedom of contract and so would be difficult to prohibit. Nevertheless when the contract is severable the choice must be logically consistent, i.e. it must relate to elements in the contract which can be governed by different laws without giving rise to contradictions. For example, an "index-linking clause" may be made subject to a different law ; on the other hand it is unlikely that repudiation of the contract for non-performance would be subjected to two different laws, one for the vendor and the other for the purchaser. Recourse must be had to Article 4 of the Convention if the chosen laws cannot be logically reconciled.

In the opinion of these experts the danger that the argument of severability might be used to avoid certain mandatory provisions is eliminated by the operation of Article 7. The experts concerned also emphasized that severability should not be limited to cases of express choice of law.

The solution adopted in the last sentence of Article 3 (1) is prompted by exactly this kind of idea. The Group did not adopt the idea that the judge can use a partial choice of law as the basis for a presumption in favour of one law invoked to govern the contract in its entirety. Such an idea might be conducive to error in situations in which the parties had reached agreement on the choice of law solely on a specific point. Recourse must be had to Article 4 in the case of partial choice.

5. The first sentence of Article 3 (2) leaves the parties maximum freedom as to the time at which the choice of applicable law can be made.

It may be made either at the time the contract is concluded or at an earlier or later date. The second sentence of paragraph 2 also leaves the parties maximum freedom as to amendment of the choice of applicable law previously made.

The solution adopted by the Group in paragraph 2 corresponds only in part to what seems to be the current state of the law on this point in the Member States of the Community.

In the Federal Republic of Germany and in France the choice of applicable law by the parties can apparently be made even after the contract has been concluded, and the courts sometimes deduce the applicable law from the parties' attitude during the proceedings when they refer with clear agreement to a specific law. The power of the parties to vary the choice of law applicable to their contract also seems to be very widely accepted (27).

Case law in the Netherlands seems to follow the same line of interpretation (28).

In Italy, however, the Court of Cassation (sitting as a full court) stated in its judgment of 28 June 1966 No 1680 in Assael Nissim v. Crespi that ; "the parties" choice of applicable law is not admissible if made after the contract has been drawn up' (29).

According to this dictum, which Italian commentators do not wholly support (30) the choice can be made only at the time the contract is concluded. Once the choice is made, the parties no longer have the option of agreeing to nominate a law other than that nominated at the time of concluding the contract.

In the laws of England and Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland and Ireland, there is no clear authority as to the law which governs the possibility of a change in the proper law.

6. The liberal solution adopted by the Group seems to be in accordance with the requirement of logical consistency. Once the principle of freedom of contract has been accepted, and having regard to the fact that the requirement of a choice of law by the parties may arise both at the time of conclusion of the contract and after that time, it seems quite logical that the power of the parties should not be limited solely to the time of conclusion of the contract. The same applies to a change (by a new agreement between the parties) in the applicable law previously chosen.

As to the way in which the choice of law can be changed, it is quite natural that this change should be subject to the same rules as the initial choice.

If the choice of law is made or changed in the course of proceedings the question arises as to the limits within which the choice or change can be effective. However, the question falls within the ambit of the national law of procedure, and can be settled only in accordance with that law.

7. The second sentence of Article 3 (2) states that a change in the applicable law after the contract has been concluded shall not prejudice its formal validity under Article 9 or adversely affect the rights of third parties. The purpose of the reservation concerning the formal validity of the contract is to avoid a situation whereby the agreement between the parties to subject the contract to a law other than that which previously governed it could create doubts as to the validity of the contract during the period preceding the agreement between the parties. The preservation of third-party rights appears to be entirely justified. In certain legal systems, a third party may have acquired rights in consequence of a contract concluded betwen two other persons. These rights cannot be affected by a subsequent change in the choice of the applicable law.

8. Article 3 (3) provides that the choice of a foreign law by the parties, whether or not accompanied by the choice of a foreign tribunal, shall not, where all other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are connected with one country only, prejudice the application of the law of that country which cannot be derogated from by contract, hereinafter called "mandatory rules".

This solution is the result of a compromise between two lines of argument which have been diligently pursued within the Group : the wish on the one hand of certain experts to limit the parties' freedom of choice embodied in this Article by means of a correcting factor specifying that the choice of a foreign law would be insufficient per se to permit the application of that law if the situation at the moment of choice did not involve another foreign element, and on the other the concern of other experts, notably the United Kingdom experts, that such a correcting factor would be too great an obstacle to the freedom of the parties in situations in which their choice appeared justified, made in good faith, and capable of serving interests worthy of protection. In particular these experts emphasized that departures from the principle of the parties' freedom of choice should be authorized only in exceptional circumstances, such as the application of the mandatory rules of a law other than that chosen by the parties ; they also gave several examples of cases in which the choice of a foreign law by the parties was fully justified, although there was apparently no other foreign element in the situation.

The Group recognized that this concern was well founded, while maintaining the principle that the choice by the parties of a foreign law where all the other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are connected with one country only shall not prejudice the application of the mandatory rules of the law of that country.

9. Article 3 (4) merely refers questions relating to the existence and validity of the parties' consent as to the choice of the law applicable to the provisions of Articles 8, 9 and 11. We will return to these matters in the comments on those Articles.

Applicable law in the absence of choice

1. In default of an express or implied choice by the parties, there is at present no uniform way of determining the law applicable to contracts in the legal systems of the Member States of the Community (31).

In French and Belgian law no distinction is to be drawn between the express and hypothetical (or presumed) will of the parties. Failing an express choice of applicable law, the courts look for various "pointers" capable of showing that the contract is located in a particular country. This localization is sometimes regarded subjectively as equivalent to the probable wish of the parties had such a wish been expressed, sometimes objectively as equivalent to the country with which the transaction is most closely connected (32).

The objective concept seems to be receiving more and more support from legal writers and from case law. Following this concept, the Paris Court stated in its judgment of 27 January 1955 (Soc. Jansen v. Soc. Heurtey) that, in default of an indication of the will of the parties, the applicable law "is determined objectively by the fact that the contract is located by its context and economic aspects in a particular country, the place with which the transaction is most closely connected being that in which the contract is to be performed in fulfilment of the obligation characteristic of its nature" (33).

It is this concept of the location of the contracts that is referred to, in terms clearly modelled on the above judgment, in the second paragraph of Article 2313 of the French draft, which states that in default of the expressed will of the parties "the contract is governed by the law with which it is most closely connected by its economic aspects, and notably by the main place of performance".

Similarly, in German law the solution adopted by the courts in determining the law of the contract in the absence of choice by the parties is based largely upon the search for "pointers" capable of showing the "hypothetischer Parteiwille", the presumed will of the parties, having regard to the general interests at stake in each particular case. If this gives no result, the law applicable to the contract according to German case law is determined by the place of performance : more precisely, by the place of performance of each of the obligations arising from the contract, because the German courts take the view that if the various contractual obligations are to be performed in different countries, each shall be governed by the law of the country in which it is performed (34).

In English law where the parties have not expressly chosen the proper law and no choice can be inferred, the law applicable to the contract is the system of law with which the transaction has its "closest and most real connection" (35). In such a case the judge does not seek to ascertain the actual intentions of the contracting parties, because that is non-existent, but seeks "to determine for the parties what is the proper law which, as just and reasonable persons, they ought to have intended if they had thought about the question when they made the contract" (36). In this inquiry, the court has to consider all the circumstances of the case. No one factor is decisive ; instead a wide range of factors must be taken into account, such as for instance, the place of residence or business of the parties, the place of performance, the place of contracting and the nature and subject-matter of the contract.

Scots law adopts a similar approach (36a), as does the law of Ireland.

In Italian law, where the presumed will of the parties plays no part, the matter is settled expressly and directly by the legislature. Failing a choice of law by the parties, the obligations arising from the contract are governed by the following: (a) contracts for employment on board foreign ships or aircraft, by the national law of the ship or aircraft (Naval Code Article 9);

(b) marine, domestic and air hiring contracts, charters and transport contracts, by the national law of the ship or aircraft (Naval Code Article 10);

(c) all other contracts, by the national law of the contracting parties, if common to both ; otherwise by the law of the place where the contract was concluded (preliminary provisions of the Civil Code, Article 25, first subparagraph).

The abovementioned laws are of subsidiary effect only ; they apply only in default of an expression of the parties' will as to the law applicable. Italian case law so holds and legal writers concur with this view (37).

To conclude this short survey, only the provisions of the third and fourth paragraphs of Article 13 of the 1969 Benelux Treaty which has not entered into force remain to be mentioned. According to the third paragraph, in default of a choice by the parties "the contract shall be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected", an according to the fourth paragraph "when it is impossible to determine that country, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country in which it was concluded". One may note a tendency in Netherlands case law to formulate special rules of reference for certain types of contract (see "Journal du Droit Int. 1978, pp. 336 to 344" and "Neth. Int. Law Rev. 1974, pp. 315 to 316"), i.e. contracts of employment, agency contracts and contracts of carriage.

The foregoing survey has shown that, with the sole exception of Italy, where the subsidiary law applicable to the contract is determined once and for all by hard-and-fast connecting factors, all the other Community countries have preferred and continue to prefer a more flexible approach, leaving the judge to select the preponderant and decisive connecting factor for determining the law applicable to the contract in each specific case among the various elements of the contract and the circumstances of the case.

2. Having considered the advantages and disadvantages of the solutions adopted by the legislatures and the case law of the Member States of the Community and after analyzing a range of ideas and alternatives advanced both by the rapporteur and by several delegates, the Group agreed upon the uniform rule embodied in Article 4.

The first paragraph of this Article provides that, in default of a choice by the parties, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country with which it has the closest connection.

In order to determine the country with which the contract is most closely connected, it is also possible to take account of factors which supervened after the conclusion of the contract.

In fact the beginning of the first paragraph does not mention default of choice by the parties ; the expression used is "to the extent that the law applicable to the contract has not been chosen in accordance with Article 3". The use of these words is justified by reference to what has been said in paragraph 4 of the commentary on Article 3.

However, the flexibility of the general principle established by paragraph 1 is substantially modified by the presumptions in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4, and by a strictly limited exception in favour of severability at the end of paragraph 1.

3. According to Article 4 (2), it is presumed that the contract has the closest connection with the country in which the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has his habitual residence at the time when the contract is concluded, or, in the case of a body corporate or unincorporate, its central administration. If the contract is concluded by that party in the course of his trade or profession, the country concerned is that in which his principal place of business is situated or, if the contract is to be performed through a place of business other than the principal place of business, the country in which that other place of business is situated. Article 4 (2) establishes a presumption which may be rebutted in accordance with Article 4 (5).

The kind of idea upon which paragraph 2 is based is certainly not entirely unknown to some specialists. It gives effect to a tendency which has been gaining ground both in legal writings and in case law in many countries in recent decades (38). The submission of the contract, in the absence of a choice by the parties, to the law appropriate to the characteristic performance defines the connecting factor of the contract from the inside, and not from the outside by elements unrelated to the essence of the obligation such as the nationality of the contracting parties or the place where the contract was concluded.

In addition it is possible to relate the concept of characteristic performance to an even more general idea, namely the idea that his performance refers to the function which the legal relationship involved fulfils in the economic and social life of any country. The concept of characteristic performance essentially links the contract to the social and economic environment of which it will form a part.

Identifying the characteristic performance of a contract obviously presents no difficulty in the case of unilateral contracts. By contrast, in bilateral (reciprocal) contracts whereby the parties undertake mutual reciprocal performance, the counter-performance by one of the parties in a modern economy usually takes the form of money. This is not, of course, the characteristic performance of the contract. It is the performance for which the payment is due, i.e. depending on the type of contract, the delivery of goods, the granting of the right to make use of an item of property, the provision of a service, transport, insurance, banking operations, security, etc., which usually constitutes the centre of gravity and the socio-economic function of the contractual transaction.

As for the geographical location of the characteristic performance, it is quite natural that the country in which the party liable for the performance is habitually resident or has his central administration (if a body corporate or unincorporate) or his place of business, according to whether the performance in question is in the course of his trade or profession or not, should prevail over the country of performance where, of course, the latter is a country other than that of habitual residence, central administration or the place of business. In the solution adopted by the Group the position is that only the place of habitual residence or of the central administration or of the place of business of the party providing the essential performance is decisive in locating the contract.

Thus, for example, in a banking contract the law of the country of the banking establishment with which the transaction is made will normally govern the contract. It is usually the case in a commercial contract of sale that the law of the vendor's place of business will govern the contract. To take another example, in an agency contract concluded in France between a Belgian commercial agent and a French company, the characteristic performance being that of the agent, the contract will be governed by Belgian law if the agent has his place of business in Belgium (39).

In conclusion, Article 4 (2) gives specific form and objectivity to the, in itself, too vague concept of "closest connection". At the same time it greatly simplifies the problem of determining the law applicable to the contract in default of choice by the parties. The place where the act was done becomes unimportant. There is no longer any need to determine where the contract was concluded, with all the difficulties and the problems of classification that arise in practice. Seeking the place of performance or the different places of performance and classifying them becomes superfluous.

For each category of contract it is the characteristic performance that is in principle the relevant factor in applying the presumption for determining the applicable law, even in situations peculiar to certain contracts, as for example in the contract of guarantee where the characteristic performance is always that of the guarantor, whether in relation to the principal debtor or the creditor.

To counter the possibility of changes in the connecting factor ("conflits mobiles") in the application of paragraph 2, it has been made clear that the country of habitual residence or of the principal place of business of the party providing the characteristic performance is the country in which he is habitually resident or has his central administration or place of business, as appropriate, "at the time of conclusion of the contract".

According to the last part of paragraph 2, if the contract prescribes performance by an establishment other than the principal place of business, it is presumed that the contract has the closest connection with the country of that other establishment.

4. Article 4 (3) establishes that the presumption in paragraph 2 does not operate to the extent that the subject of the contract is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property. It is presumed in this case that the contract is most closely connected with the country in which the immovable property is situated.

It is advisable to state that the provision in question merely establishes a presumption in favour of the law of the country in which the immovable property is situate. In other words this is a presumption which, like that in paragraph 2, could also be rebutted if circumstances so required.

For example, this presumption could be rebutted if two persons resident in Belgium were to make a contract for renting a holiday home on the island of Elba (Italy). It might be thought in such a case that the contract was most closely connected with the country of the contracting parties' residence, not with Italy.

Finally it should be stressed that paragraph 3 does not extend to contracts for the construction or repair of immovable property. This is because the main subject-matter of these contracts is the construction or repair rather than the immovable property itself.

5. After a long and animated discussion the Group decided to include transport contracts within the scope of the convention. However, the Group deemed it inappropriate to submit contracts for the carriage of goods to the presumption contained in paragraph 2, having regard to the peculiarities of this type of transport. The contract for carriage of goods is therefore made subject to a presumption of its own, namely that embodied in paragraph 4. This presumption may be rebutted in accordance with Article 4 (5).

According to this fourth paragraph it is presumed in the case of contracts for the carriage of goods that if the country in which the carrier has his principal place of business at the time the contract is concluded is also the country of the place of loading or unloading or of the principal place of business of the consignor, the contract is most closely connected with that country. The term "consignor" refers in general to any person who consigns goods to the carrier (Afzender, Aflader, Verzender, Mittente, Caricatore, etc.).

Thus the paragraph 4 presumption rests upon a combination of connecting factors. To counter the possibility of changes in the connecting factor in applying the paragraph, it has been made clear here also that the reference to the country in which the carrier has his principal place of business must be taken to refer to the carrier's place of business "at the time the contract is concluded".

It appears that for purposes of the application of this paragraph the places of loading and unloading which enter into consideration are those agreed at the time when the contract is concluded.

It often happens in contracts for carriage that a person who contracts to carry goods for another does not carry them himself but arranges for a third party to do so. In Article 4 (4) the term "the carrier" means the party to the contract who undertakes to carry the goods, whether or not he performs the carriage himself.

In addition, the third sentence of paragraph 4 provides that in applying that paragraph single-voyage charterparties and other contracts whose main purpose is the carriage of goods shall be treated as contracts for the carriage of goods. The wording of paragraph 4 is intended to make it clear that charterparties may be considered to be contracts for the carriage of goods in so far as that is their substance.

6. Contracts for the carriage of passengers remain subject to the general presumption, i.e. that provided for in Article 4 (2).

This solution was adopted by majority vote within the Group. Certain delegations favoured the special presumption emodied in paragraph 4, arguing that, as with other types of transport, the need was for a combination of connecting factors, in view of the fact that reference solely to the place where the carrier, who provides the characteristic performance, has his principal place of business may not be a significant connecting factor : by way of example they cited the case of transportation of French or English passengers between London and Paris by an American airline. It was also emphasized that in a mixed contract (passengers and goods) the difficulty of applying two different laws would arise.

Nevertheless the other delegations were against the special presumption, their principal arguments being : the application of several laws to passengers on the same journey would involve serious difficulties ; the formulation of paragraph 4 is such that it would hardly ever apply to carriage of passengers, so recourse would usually be had to the first paragraph of Article 4, which does not give the judge sufficiently precise criteria for decision ; contracts of carriage normally contain a clause conferring jurisdiction on the court of the carrier's principal place of business, and paragraph 2 would operate so that the law of the court of competent jurisdiction would coincide with the applicable law.

In any event it should be stated that the judge will not be able to exclude consideration of the country in which the carrier has his principal place of business in seeking the places with which the contract is most closely connected.

Finally it is useful to note that the Group repeatedly stressed in the course of the discussions on transport problems that the international conventions took precedence in this matter.

7. Article 4 (2) does not apply when the characteristic performance connot be determined. The case then falls under paragraph 1, i.e. the contract will be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected.

The first part of Article 4 (5) contains precisely that provision.

However, that paragraph also provides for the possibility of disregarding the presumptions in paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 when all the circumstances show the contract to have closer connections with another country. In this case the law of that other country is applied.

The grounds for the latter provision are as follows. Given the entirely general nature of the conflict rule contained in Article 4, the only exemptions to which are certain contracts made by consumers and contracts of employment, it seemed essential to provide for the possibility of applying a law other than those referred to in the presumptions in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 whenever all the circumstances show the contract to be more closely connected with another country.

Article 4 (5) obviously leaves the judge a margin of discretion as to whether a set of circumstances exists in each specific case justifying the non-application of the presumptions in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4. But this is the inevitable counterpart of a general conflict rule intended to apply to almost all types of contract.

8. Article 4 (1) allows parts of the contract to be severed under certain conditions. The last sentence of this paragraph provides that if one part of the contract can be separated from the rest and is more closely connected with another country, then by way of exception the law of that other country can be applied to that part of the contract.

Discussion of the matter within the Group revealed that no delegation wished to encourage the idea of severability (dépeçage). However, most of the experts were in favour of allowing the court to effect a severance, by way of exception, for a part of the contract which is independent and separable, in terms of the contract and not of the dispute, where that part has a closer connection with another country (for example, contracts for joint venture, complex contracts).

As to whether or not the possibility of severance should be mentioned in the text of the convention itself most delegations were in favour of its being mentioned. It was emphasized in particular that mere reference to the matter in the report would be insufficient by itself, because in some Member States of the Community it is not usual to take account of the report. It was also emphasized that to include it in the text would reduce the risk of variation in the application of the convention on this point, because the text would specify the conditions under which severance was allowed.

The wording of the last sentence in paragraph 1 embodies precisely this idea. The words "by way of exception" are therefore to be interpreted in the sense that the court must have recourse to severance as seldom as possible.

9. It should be noted that the presumptions mentioned in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of Article 4 are only rebuttable presumptions.

Certain consumer contracts

1. Article 5 of the convention establishes a specific conflict rule for certain contracts made by consumers. Most of the experts who have participated in the Group's work since 1973 have taken the view that consumer protection, the present aim of several national legislatures, would entail a reversal of the connecting factor provided for in Article 4 or a modification of the principle of freedom of choice provided for in Article 3. On the one hand the choice of the parties should not adversely affect the mandatory provisions of the State in which the consumer is habitually resident ; on the other, in this type of contract it is the law of the buyer (the weaker party) which should normally prevail over that of the seller.

2. The definition of consumer contracts corresponds to that contained in Article 13 of the Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments. It should be interpreted in the light of its purpose which is to protect the weaker party and in accordance with other international instruments with the same purpose such as the Judgments Convention. Thus, in the opinion of the majority of the delegations it will, normally, only apply where the person who supplies goods or services or provides credit acts in the course of his trade or profession. Similarly, the rule does not apply to contracts made by traders, manufacturers or persons in the exercise of a profession (doctors, for example) who buy equipment or obtain services for that trade or profession. If such a person acts partly within, partly outside his trade or profession the situation only falls within the scope of Article 5 if he acts primarily outside his trade or profession. Where the receiver of goods or services or credit in fact acted primarily outside his trade or profession but the other party did not know this and, taking all the circumstances into account should not reasonably have known it, the situation falls outside the scope of Article 5. Thus if the receiver of goods or services holds himself out as a professional, e.g. by ordering goods which might well be used in his trade or profession on his professional paper the good faith of the other party is protected and the case will not be governed by Article 5.

The rule extends to credit sales as well as to cash sales, but sales of securities are excluded. The Group has specifically avoided a more precise definition of "consumer contract" in order to avoid conflict with the various definitions already given by national legislation. The rule also applies to the supply of services, such as insurance, as well as supply of goods.

3. Paragraph 2 embodies the principle that a choice of law in a consumer contract cannot deprive the consumer of the protection afforded to him by the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence. This principle shall, however, only apply under certain conditions set out in the three indents of paragraph 2.

The first indent reales to situations where the trader has taken steps to market his goods or services in the country where the consumer resides. It is intended to cover inter alia mail order and door-step selling. Thus the trader must have done certain acts such as advertising in the press, or on radio or television, or in the cinema or by catalogues aimed specifically at that country, or he must have made business proposals individually through a middleman or by canvassing. If, for example, a German makes a contract in response to an advertisement published by a French company in a German publication, the contract is covered by the special rule. If, on the other hand, the German replies to an advertisement in American publications, even if they are sold in Germany, the rule does not apply unless the advertisement appeared in special editions of the publication intended for European countries. In the latter case the seller will have made a special advertisement intended for the country of the purchaser.

The Group expressly adopted the words "steps necessary on his part" in order to avoid the classic problem of determining the place where the contract was concluded. This is a particularly delicate matter in the situations referred to, because it involves international contracts normally concluded by correspondence. The word "steps" includes inter alia writing or any action taken in consequence of an offer or advertisement.

According to the second indent Article 5 shall apply in all situations where the trader or his agent has received the order of the consumer in the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence. This provision is a parallel to Article 3 (2) of the 1955 Hague Convention on international sales.

There is a considerable overlap between the first and the second indents. This overlap is, however, not complete. For example, the second indent applies in situations where the consumer has addressed himself to the stand of a foreign firm at a fair or exhibition taking place in the consumers country or to a permanent branch or agency of a foreign firm established in the consumer's country even though the foreign firm has not advertised in the consumer's country in a way covered by the first indent. The word "agent" is intended to cover all persons acting on behalf of the trader.

The third indent deals with a situation which is rather special but where, on the other hand, a majority of delegations found a clear need for protecting the consumer under the provisions of Article 5. It covers what one might describe as "border-crossing excursion-selling", i.e. for example, a situation where a store-owner in country A arranges one-day bus trips for consumers in a neighbouring country B with the main purpose of inducing the consumers to buy in his store. This is a practice well-known in some areas. The situation is not covered by the first indent because there it is required that the consumer has taken in his own country all the steps necessary on his part for the conclusion of the contract. The third indent is, unlike the rest of paragraph 2, limited to contracts for the sale of goods. The condition that the journey was arranged by the seller shall not be understood in the narrow way that the seller must himself have taken care of the transportation. It is sufficient that the seller has arranged the journey by way of an agreement with the transportation company.

In describing the situation in which Article 5 applies to consumer contracts, the Group has not followed the text of Article 13 (1) of the Judgments Convention as amended by the Accession Convention. On the one hand Article 5 contains no special provision for hire purchase contracts and loans on deferred terms. On the other hand, Article 13 of the Judgments Convention has no provisions parallel to the second and third indents of Article 5 (2).

4. Article 5 (3) introduces an exception to Article 4 of the Convention. According to this paragraph, notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4 and in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, a contract made by a consumer shall "be governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence if it is entered into in the circumstances described in the second paragraph of Article 5".

The wording of paragraph 3 is sufficiently clear, and calls for no additional examination.

5. Under the terms of paragraph 4 thereof, Article 5 applies neither to contracts of carriage (a) nor to contracts relating to the supply of services provided exclusively in a country other than that in which the consumer is resident (b). The exclusion of contracts of carriage is justified by the fact that the special protective measures for which provision is made in Article 5 are not appropriate for governing contracts of this type. Similarly, in the case of contracts relating to the supply of services (for example, accommodation in a hotel, or a language course) which are supplied exclusively outside the State in which the consumer is resident, the latter cannot reasonably expect the law of his State of origin to be applied in derogation from the general rules of Articles 3 and 4. In the cases referred to under (b) the contract is more closely connected with the State in which the other contracting party is resident, even if the latter has performed one of the acts described in paragraph 2 (advertising, for example) in the State in which the consumer is resident.

6. The intention of paragraph 5 is to ensure that Article 5, notwithstanding the exclusions made in paragraph 4, shall apply to contracts providing for what is in English normally called a "package tour", i.e. an ordinary tourist arrangement consisting of a combination of travel and accommodation for an inclusive price. If a package tour starts with transportation from the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence the contract would not be excluded according to paragraph 4. The importance of paragraph 5 is, therefore, that it ensures application of Article 5 also in situations where the services provided for under a package tour start with transportation from another country. However, Article 5 of course only applies to package tours where the general conditions of paragraphs 1 and 2 are fulfilled, i.e. that the contract can be regarded as a consumer contract and that it is entered into in one of the situations mentioned in paragraph 2.

When formulating paragraph 5, the Group met with difficulty in defining a "package tour". The Group confined itself to a definition which underlines the main elements of this type of contract well known in practice, leaving it to the courts to solve any possible doubt as to the exact delimitation. The accommodation which is a part of a package tour must normally be separate from the transportation, and so paragraph 5 would not apply to the provision of a sleeper on a train.

Individual employment contracts

1. Re-examination of the specific conflict rule in the matter of contracts of employment led the Group to make fundamental changes to this Article, which already appeared (as Article 5) in the original preliminary draft, and to harmonize its approach with that of the present Article 5 on consumer contracts.

In both cases the question was one of finding a more appropriate arrangement for matters in which the interests of one of the contracting parties are not the same as those of the other, and at the same time to secure thereby more adequate protection for the party who from the socio-economic point of view is regarded as the weaker in the contractual relationship.

2. On this basis, Article 6 (1) sets a limit on the parties' freedom to choose the applicable law, as permitted by Article 3 of the convention, affirming that this choice in contracts of employment "shall not have the result of depriving the employee of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law which would be applicable under paragraph 2 in the absence of choice".

The purpose of this text is as follows:

if the law applicable pursuant to paragraph 2 grants employees protection which is greater than that resulting from the law chosen by the parties, the result is not that the choice of this law becomes completely without effect. On the contrary, in this case the law which was chosen continues in principle to be applicable. In so far as the provisions of the law applicable pursuant to paragraph 2 give employees better protection than the chosen law, for example by giving a longer period of notice, these provisions set the provisions of the chosen law aside and are applicable in their place.

The mandatory rules from which the parties may not derogate consist not only of the provisions relating to the contract of employment itself, but also provisions such as those concerning industrial safety and hygiene which are regarded in certain Member States as being provisions of public law.

It follows from this text that if the law of the country designated by Article 6 (2) makes the collective employment agreements binding for the employer, the employee will not be deprived of the protection afforded to him by these collective employment agreements by the choice of law of another State in the individual employment contract.

Article 6 applies to individual employment contracts and not to collective agreements. Consequently, the fact that an employment contract is governed by a foreign law cannot affect the powers which an employee's trade union might derive from collective agreements in its own country.

The present wording of Article 6 speaks of "contract of employment" instead of "employment relationship" as in the original preliminary draft. It should be stated, however, that the rule in Article 6 also covers the case of void contracts and also de facto employment relationships in particular those characterized by failure to respect the contract imposed by law for the protection of employees.

3. According to Article 6 (2), in the absence of choice by the parties and notwithstanding the provisions of Article 4, the contract of employment is governed as follows: (a) by the law of the country in which the employee habitually carries out his work in performance of his contract, even if he is temporarily employed in another country ; or

(b) if the employee does not habitually carry out his work in any one country, by the law of the country in which the place of business through which he was engaged is situated, unless it appears from the cirumstances as a whole that the contract of employment is more closely connected with another country, in which case the law of that other country applies.

After a thorough examination of the various problems raised by contracts of employment in private international law, in the course of which particular consideration was given both to the draft Regulation prepared in this connection by the EEC Commission and to the latest trends in the legal literature and case law of the Member States of the Community, the Group finally adopted the following solution. If the employee habitually works in one and the same country the contract of employment is governed by the law of that country even if the employee is temporarily employed in another country. This is the rule which appears in subparagraph 2 (a). On the other hand, if the employee does not habitually work in one and the same country the contract of employment is governed by the law of the country in which the place of business through which he was engaged is situated. This is the rule which appears in subparagraph 2 (b).

These solutions obviously differ substantially from those which would have resulted from the Article 4 presumption.

However, the last sentence of Article 6 (2) provides that if it appears from the cirumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country, the law of the latter country is applied.

4. As regards work done outside the jurisdiction of any State, the Group considered that the rule adopted in Article 6 could in principle be applied. In the case of work on an oil-rig platform on the high seas, the law of the country of the undertaking which engaged the employee should be applied.

The Group did not seek a special rule for the work of members of the crew on board a ship.

Mandatory rules

1. The wording of Article 7 of the original preliminary draft has been considerably improved in the course of the Group's re-examination of the text of the convention since 1973, in order to permit a better interpretation in the various situations in which it will have to be applied.

The Group reiterated at its last meeting that Article 7 merely embodies principles which already exist in the laws of the Member States of the Community.

The principle that national courts can give effect under certain conditions to mandatory provisions other than those applicable to the contract by virtue of the choice of the parties or by virtue of a subsidiary connecting factor, has been recognized for several years both in legal writings and in practice in certain of our countries and elsewhere.

For example, the principle was recognized in the abovementioned 1966 judgment of the Netherlands Supreme Court in the Alnati case (cited supra, commentary on Article 3 (1)) in which the Court said that, although the law applicable to contracts of an international character can, as a matter of principle, only be that which the parties themselves have chosen, "it may be that, for a foreign State, the observance of certain of its rules, even outside its own territory, is of such importance that the courts must take account of them, and hence apply them in preference to the law of another State which may have been chosen by the parties to govern their contract".

This judgment formed the basis for the second paragraph of Article 13 of the non-entered-into-force Benelux Treaty of 1969 on uniform rules of private international law, which provides that "where the contract is manifestly connected with a particular country, the intention of the parties shall not have the effect of excluding the provisions of the law of that country which, by reason of their special nature and subject-matter, exclude the application of any other law".

The same attitude, at any event, underlies Article 16 of the Hague Convention of 14 March 1978 on the law applicable to agency, whereby, in the application of that convention, effect may be given to the mandatory rules of any State with which the situation has a significant connection, if and to the extent that, by the law of that State, those rules are applicable irrespective of the law indicated by its confluct rules.

On the other hand, despite the opinion of some jurists, it must be frankly recognized that no clear indication in favour of the principle in question seems discernible in the English cases (Ralli Bros v. Sota y Aznar ; Regazzoni v. Sethia ; Rossano v. Manufacturers Life Insurance Co.) (40).

2. The wording of Article 7 (1) specifically provides that in the application of the convention "effect may be given to the mandatory rules of the law of another country with which the situation has a close connection if and in so far as, under the law of the latter country, those rules must be applied whatever the law applicable to the contract".

The former text did not specify the nature of the "connection" which must exist between the contract and a country other than that whose law is applicable. Several experts have observed that this omission might oblige the court in certain cases to take a large number of different and even contradictory laws into account. This lack of precision could make the court's task difficult, prolong the proceedings, and lend itself to delaying tactics. Accepting the force of these observations, the Group decided that it is essential that there be a genuine connection with the other country, and that a merely vague connection is not adequate. For example, there would be a genuine connection when the contract is to be performed in that other country or when one party is resident or has his main place of business in that other country. Among the suggested versions, the Group finally adopted the word "close" which seemed the most suitable to define the situation which it wished to cover.

The connection in question must exist between the contract as a whole and the law of a country other than that to which the contract is submitted. The Group rejected the proposal by one delegation designed to establish a connection between the point in dispute and a specific law. In fact this proposal would have given rise to a regrettable dismemberment of the contract and would have led to the application of mandatory laws not foreseeable by the parties. Nevertheless the Group preferred to replace the word "the contracts" by "the situation".

Since the former text seemed to some delegations to be lacking in clarity, the Group decided to improve the wording. In the new text it has therefore stated that the legal system of the country of which these mandatory provisions are an integral part must be examined to find out whether these provisions apply in the particular case whatever the law applicable to the contract. Furthermore, in the French text the word "loi" has been replaced by the word "droit" in order to avoid any doubts as to the scope of the rule, which is to cover both "legislative" provisions of any other country and also common law rules. Finally, after a long discussion, the majority of the Group, in view of the concern expressed by certain delegations in relation to constitutional difficulties, decided that it was preferable to allow the courts a discretion in the application of this Article.

3. Article 7 (1) adds in relation to the mandatory rules that their nature and purpose, and the consequences of their application or non-application, must be taken into account in order to decide whether effect should be given to them.

Thus the application of the mandatory provisions of any other country must be justified by their nature and by their purpose. One delegation had suggested that this should be defined by saying that the nature and purpose of the provisions in question should be established according to internationally recognized criteria (for example, similar laws existing in other countries or which serve a generally recognized interest). However, other experts pointed out that these international criteria did not exist and that consequently difficulties would be created for the court. Moreover this formula would touch upon the delicate matter of the credit to be given to foreign legal systems. For these reasons the Group, while not disapproving this idea, did not adopt this drafting proposal.

Additionally, in considering whether to give effect to these mandatory rules, regard must be had to "the consequences of their application or non-application".

Far from weakening the rule this subsequent element - which did not appear in the original preliminary draft - defines, clarifies and strengthens it. In fact, the judge must be given a power of discretion, in particular in the case where contradictory mandatory rules of two different countries both purport simultaneously to be applicable to one and the same situation, and where a choice must necessarily be made between them.

To complete the comments on Article 7 (1) it only remains to emphasize that the words "effect may be given" impose on the court the extremely delicate task of combining the mandatory provisions with the law normally applicable to the contract in the particular situation in question. The novelty of this provision, and the fear of the uncertainty to which it could give rise, have led some delegations to ask that a reservation may be entered on Article 7 (1) (see Article 22 (1) (a)).

4. Article 7 (2) states that "nothing in this Convention shall restrict the application of the rules of the law of the forum in a situation where they are mandatory irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the contract".

The origin of this paragraph is found in the concern of certain delegations to safeguard the rules of the law of the forum (notably rules on cartels, competition and restrictive practices, consumer protection and certain rules concerning carriage) which are mandatory in the situation whatever the law applicable to the contract may be.

Thus the paragraph merely deals with the application of mandatory rules (lois d'application immédiate ; leggi di applicazione necessaria ; etc) in a different way from paragraph 1 (40a).

Material validity

1. Article 8 (1) provides that the existence and validity of a contract, or of any term of a contract, shall be determined by the law which would govern it under this Convention if the contract or term were valid.

The paragraph is intended to cover all aspects of formation of the contract other than general validity. As we have emphasized previously in paragraph 9 of the comments on Article 3, this provision is also applicable with regard to the existence and validity of the parties' consent as to choice of the law applicable.

The word "term" has been adopted to cover cases in which there is a dispute as to the validity of a term of the contract, such as a choice of law clause.

2. Notwithstanding the general rule in paragraph 1, paragraph 2 provides a special rule which relates only to the existence and not to the validity of consent.

According to this special rule a party may rely upon the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence to establish that he did not consent if it appears from the circumstances that it would not be reasonable to determine the effect of his conduct in accordance with the law specified in paragraph 1.

The solution adopted by the Group in this respect is designed inter alia to solve the problem of the implications of silence by one party as to the formation of the contract.

The word "conduct" must be taken to cover both action and failure to act by the party in question ; it does not, therefore, relate solely to silence.

The words "if it appears from the circumstances" mean that the court must have regard to all the circumstances of the case, not solely to those in which the party claiming that he has not consented to the contract has acted. The Court will give particular consideration to the practices followed by the parties inter se as well as their previous business relationships.

According to the circumstances, the words "a party" can relate either to the offeror or to the offeree.

The application of paragraph 2 can result in a decision releasing a party who would have been bound under the terms of paragraph 1, but it can never produce the opposite effect of holding that a contract exists which is non-existent by its proper law.

Article 9 (4) contains a special rule relating to acts intended to have legal effect, such as, in accordance with the law of many countries, an offer. Such acts have not been mentioned in Article 8. Nonetheless, the rules in Article 8 apply to such acts by way of analogy.

Formal validity

Article 9 deals with the formal validity of contracts and acts intended to have legal effect. The first four paragraphs lay down rules governing all contracts and acts intended to have legal effect. The last two paragraphs lay down special rules peculiar to certain types of contract. I. General rules (paragraphs 1 to 4 inclusive)

The scope of these general rules needs to be specified before indicating the various laws which they declare to be applicable. A. The scope of the general rules 1. Acts to which they apply

Article 9 applies to contracts and unilateral acts intended to have legal effect. The preliminary draft of 1972 used only the term "act intended to have legal effect" (acte juridique) which, in the terminology originating from Roman law, includes both categories. The inclusion in Article 9 of both contracts and acts intended to have legal effect, mentioned successively, is due merely to a wish to ensure clarity, since the rules to be applied are based on the same principles in both cases.

Unilateral acts intended to have legal effect which fall within the scope of the Article are those which are related to an existing or contemplated contract. Acts relating to a concluded contract can be extremely varied : notice of termination, remission of a debt, declaration of rescission or repudiation, etc.

But the act must be connected with a contract. A unilateral undertaking, unconnected with a contract, as for example, in some legal systems, a recognition of a debt not arising under a contract, or a unilateral act creating, transferring or extinguishing a right in rem, would not fall within the scope of Article 9 or of any other provision in the Convention since the latter is concerned only with contractual obligations.

Such an act must also, quite clearly, relate to a contract falling within the scope of the convention. Article 9 does not apply to the formal validity of acts relating to contracts excluded from the convention under Article 1 (2) and (3).

There is no provision expressly referring to "public acts". This omission is intentional. First, the concept of a public act is not recognized in all the legal systems and could raise awkward problems of definition. Moreover, it seems wrong for there to be special provisions governing the formal validity of private law acts concluded before public officials. Indeed, as has recently been pointed out (41), it is because a public official can draw up an instrument only in accordance with the law from which he derives his authority that the formal validity for the act concluded before him is necessarily subject to that law. If, for example, a notary has not observed the law from which he derives his authority, the contract he has drawn up will not of course be a valid notarial act. But it will not be entirely void if the law which governs its substance (and which may also determine its formal validity by virtue of Article 9) does not require a special form for that type of contract.

The general rules accordingly apply to "public acts". This has the advantage of validating acts drawn up by a public official who has thought it appropriate, as happens in the Netherlands, to follow the forms laid down by the foreign law which governs the substance of the contract.

2. Article 9 does not define what is to be understood by the "formal validity" of acts. It seemed realistic to leave open this difficult problem of definition, especially as its importance has been slightly reduced in consequence of the solutions found for the problem of the connecting factor which to some extent equate formal and material validity.

It is nevertheless permissible to consider "form", for the purposes of Article 9, as including every external manifestation required on the part of a person expressing the will to be legally bound, and in the absence of which such expression of will would not be regarded as fully effective (42). This definition does not include the special requirements which have to be fulfilled where there are persons under a disability to be protected, such as the need in French law for the consent of a family council to an act for the benefit of a minor, or where an act is to be valid against third parties, for example the need in English law for a notice of a statutory assignment of a chose in action.

B. Laws to be applied 1. The principle of applying in the alternative the lex causae or the lex loci actus.

The system contained in Article 9 is a compromise between favor negotii, which tends to take a liberal attitude regarding the formalities required for acts, and the due observance of formalities which, most often, is merely giving effect to requirements of substance.

In supporting the former attitude, it did not seem possible to follow the example of the Hague Convention of 5 October 1961 concerning conflict of laws with regard to testamentary dispositions. Favor testamenti is justified by the fact that a will is an act of final disposition which by definition cannot be reenacted if its validity is challenged after the testator's death. This consideration does not affect other acts intended to have legal effect in the case of which excessive freedom with regard to formalities would result in robbing of all effect the requirements in this field which are specified by the various legal systems, very often with a legitimate aim in view. Moreover, the connection between questions of form and questions of evidence (Article 14) makes it desirable to limit the number of laws applicable to formal validity.

On the other hand, in order to avoid parties being caught unawares by the annulment of their act on the ground of an unexpected formal defect, Article 9 has, nonetheless, laid down a fairly flexible system based on applying in the alternative either the law of the place where the contract was entered into (or in the case of a unilateral act the law of the country where the act was done) or else the law which governs its substance.

This choice of applicable laws appears to be sufficient and this is why the possibility of applying the law of the common nationality or habitual residence of the parties was rejected (43). On the other hand no priority has been accorded either to the lex causae or to the lex loci actus. If the act is valid to one of these two laws, that is enough to prevent defects of form under the other from affording grounds for nullity (44).

The Group did not examine the question of which of the two laws would apply to an action brought to annul the contract for formal defect in a case where the contract would be null and void according to both these laws. If, for example, the limitation period for bringing an action for annulment on the ground of a formal defect is not the same in the two legal systems, it may seem to be in keeping with the spirit of this Article to apply the law which provides for the shorter period and, in this respect, is more favourable than the other to the validity of the act.

Renvoi must be rejected as regards formal validity as in all other matters governed by the Convention (cf. Article 15).

2. Problems raised by applying the law governing the substance of the contract to the question of formal validity

The lex causae is already recognized as applicable, either as the principal law or as a subsidiary option, to the question of formal validity by the law of the Contracting States and its application is fully justified by the logical connection between substance and form (45).

The law governing the substance of the contract must be determined by reference to Articles 3, 4 and 6 of the Convention (for contracts provided for under Article 5, see II below, Special rules peculiar to certain contracts). Article 3 (2) specifically governs the formal consequences of a voluntary change by the parties in the law governing the substance of the contract. This text means that, on this assumption of changes in the connecting facts, it is enough for the contract to be formally valid in accordance with one or other of the laws successively called upon to govern the substance of the contract.

A difficulty will arise when a contract is subject to several laws, either because the parties have selected the law applicable to a part only of their contract (Article 3 (1)), or because the court itself, by way of exception, has proceeded to sever the contract (Article 4 (1)). Which of the laws governing the substance of the contract is to determine its formal validity ? In such a case it would seem reasonable to apply the law applicable to the part of the contract most closely connected with the disputed condition on which its formal validity depends.

Article 8 (1), dealing with material validity, says that the existence and validity of a contract or of any term of a contract shall be determined by the law which would govern it under the Convention if the contract or term were valid. This is to avoid the circular argument that where there is a choice of the applicable law no law can be said to be applicable until the contract is found to be valid. A similar point arises in relation to formal validity under Article 9, and although the text does not expressly say so it is intended that "the law which governs it under this Convention" should be the law which would govern the contract if it were formally valid.

3. Problems raised by applying the locus regit actum rule to the question of formal validity

The application of the law of the country in which a contract was entered into or in which a unilateral act was done, in order to determine the formal validity of the contract or act, results from the age-old maxim locus regit actum, recognized alike, usually as a principal rule, by the law of the Contracting States (46).

However a classic difficulty arises in determining the country in which the contract was entered into when the contract has been made between persons in different countries.

To resolve this difficulty it is first necessary to describe exactly what is meant by persons being or not being in the same country. Where the contract is concluded through the offices of one or more agents, Article 9 (3) indicates clearly that the place to be taken into consideration is where the agents are acting at the time when the contract is concluded. If the parties' agents (or one party and the agent of the other) meet in a given country and conclude the contract there, this contract is considered, within the meaning of paragraph 1, to be concluded between persons in that country, even if the party or parties represented were in another country at the time. Similarly, if the parties' agents (or one party and the agent of the other) are in different countries at the time when they conclude the contract, this contract is considered, within the meaning of paragraph 2, to be concluded between persons in different countries even if both the parties represented were in fact in the same country at the time.

The question of finding which law is the law of the place where the contract was entered into and therefore determines the formal validity of a contract made between persons in different countries, in the sense just indicated, has been very widely debated. Solutions consisting in fixing the conclusion of the contract either in the place where the offer was made or in the place where the acceptance was made have been rejected as rather artificial (47). The solution consisting in applying to offer and acceptance separately the law of the country in which each was made, directly based on the Frankenstein draft for a European code of private international law and retained in the preliminary draft of 1972, and by the 1978 Swiss draft of Federal law on private international law, Article 125 (2), was also rejected. It is clear that there are numerous requirements as to formal validity which are laid down with regard to the contract itself, taken as a whole and not stage by stage. This is the case where, for example, two signatures are required or where the contract has to be made in duplicate. Accordingly, rather than split the law determining the formal validity of a contract, it seemed preferable to look for a law which would be applicable to the formal validity of the contract as a whole.

The choice was therefore between a liberal solution, retaining the application in the alternative of the law of one or other of the countries which the persons concluding the contract were at the time it was entered into, and a strict solution, requiring the cumulative application of these various laws. The liberal solution was adopted by Article 9 (2). When a contract is concluded between persons in different countries, it is formally valid if it satisfies the requirements as to form laid down by the law of one of those countries or of the law governing the substance of the contract.

4. Reservation regarding mandatory rules

Article 7 of the Convention, which contains a reservation in favour of the application of mandatory rules, may lead to the rejection of the liberal system based on the application in the alternative of either the law governing the substance of the contract or the law of the place where it was entered into. It may happen that certain formal requirements laid down by the law of the country with which a contract or act has a close connection have a mandatory character so marked that they could be applied even though the law of that country is not one of those which would normally determine formal validity under Article 9.

In this connection mention was made of the rules regarding form laid down by the law of the country where an employment contract is to be carried out, especially the requirement that a non-competition clause should be in writing, even though the oral form is permitted by the law of the place where the contract was entered into or under the law chosen by the parties.

Of course, under the system established by Article 7, it will be for the court hearing the case to decide whether it is appropriate to give effect to these mandatory provisions and consequently to disregard the rules laid down in Article 9.

II. Special rules peculiar to certain contracts (paragraphs 5 and 6)

Paragraphs 5 and 6 provide special rules for the formal validity of certain contracts made by consumers and of contracts the subject matter of which is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property. It would have been conceivable with regard to such contracts merely to apply Article 7 quite simply and, as an exception to Article 9, to allow, for example, the application of certain formal provisions for consumer protection laid down by the law of the consumer's habitual place of residence, or of certain mandatory requirements as to form imposed by the law of the country where the immovable property is situated.

This solution, however, was not thought adequate to ensure the effective application of these laws because of the discretionary power which Article 7 gives to the court hearing the case. It was accordingly decided to exclude the first four paragraphs of Article 9 completely in the case of contracts of these kinds.

The fifth paragraph of Article 9 deals with the contracts mentioned in Article 5 (1), entered into in the circumstances described in Article 5 (2), taking into account Article 5 (4) and (5).

Just as Article 5 protects the consumer, despite any choice of law specified in the contract, by imposing, as regards substance, the mandatory rules of the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence (Article 5 (3)), Article 9 (5) imposes the rules of that same country with regard to formal validity. This is justified by the very close connection, in the context of consumer protection, between mandatory rules of form and rules of substance.

For the same reasons, it might have been expected that the formal validity of employment contracts would also have been made subject to mandatory attachment to the rules of a particular national law.

This idea, though at first contemplated, was finally rejected. Indeed, contrary to Article 5 which provides explicitly that consumer contracts, in the absence of any choice by the parties, shall be subject as regards formal validity to the law of the country where the consumer has his habitual residence, for the purpose of determining the connecting factors applying to employment contracts Article 6 of the Convention only introduces rebuttable presumptions which must be disregarded in cases where it appears from the circumstances that the employment contract is more closely connected with a country other than that indicated by these presumptions. Consequently, if it had been decided that the law governing the substance of the contract should be mandatory for determining the formal validity of employment contracts, it would have been impossible, at the time a contract was entered into, to determine the law governing its formal validity because of the uncertainty caused by Article 6. Therefore no special rule was laid down regarding the formal validity of employment contracts, but thanks to Article 7, it is to be expected that the mandatory rules regarding formal validity laid down by the law of the country where the work is to be carried out will frequently be found to apply.

The sixth paragraph of Article 9 deals with contracts the subject matter of which is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property. Such contracts are not subject to a mandatory connecting factor as regards substance, Article 4 (3) merely raising a presumption in favour of the law of the country where the immovable property is situated. It is clear, however, that if the law of the country where the immovable property is situated lays down mandatory rules determining formal validity, these must be applied to the contract, but only in the probably rather rare cases where, according to that law, these formal rules must be applied even when the contract has been entered into abroad and is governed by a foreign law.

The scope of this provision is the same as that of Article 4 (3).

Article 10

Scope of the applicable law

1. Article 10 defines the scope of the law applicable to the contract under the terms of this Convention (48).

The original preliminary draft contained no specific rule on this point. It confined itself to the provision in Article 15 that the law which governs an obligation also governs the conditions for its performance, the various ways in which it can be discharged, and the consequences of non-performance. However, since Article 11 of the preliminary draft defined in detail the scope of the law applicable to non-contractual obligations, the principal subject of Article 15 was the scope of the law of the contract.

2. Article 10 (1) lists the matters which fall within the scope of the law applicable to the contract. However, this list is not exhaustive, as is indicated by the words "in particular".

The law applicable to the contract under the terms of his Convention governs firstly its interpretation (subparagraph (a)).

Secondly the law applicable to the contract governs the performance of the obligations arising from the contract (subparagraph (b)).

This appears to embrace the totality of the conditions, resulting from the law or from the contract, in accordance with which the act is essential for the fulfilment of an obligation must be performed, but not the manner of its performance (in so far as this is referred to in the second paragraph of Article 10 or the conditions relating to the capacity of the persons who are to perform it (capacity being a matter excluded from the scope of the uniform rules, subject to the provisions of Article 11) or the conditions relating to the form of the act which is to be done in performance of the obligation.

The following therefore fall within the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 10 : the diligence with which the obligation must be performed ; conditions relating to the place and time of performance ; the extent to which the obligation can be performed by a person other than the party liable ; the conditions as to performance of the obligation both in general and in relation to certain categories of obligation (joint and several obligations, alternative obligations, divisible and indivisible obligations, pecuniary obligations) ; where performance consists of the payment of a sum of money, the conditions relating to the discharge of the debtor who has made the payment, the appropriation of the payment, the receipt, etc.

Within the limits of the powers conferred upon the court by its procedural law, the law applicable to the contract also governs the consequences of total or partial failure to perform these obligations, including the assessment of damages insofar as this is governed by rules of law.

The assessment of damages has given rise to some difficulties. According to some delegations the assessment of the amount of damages is a question of fact and should not be covered by the Convention. To determine the amount of damages the court is obliged to take account of economic and social conditions in its country ; there are some cases in which the amount of damages is fixed by a jury ; some countries use methods of calculation which might not be accepted in others.

Other delegations countered these arguments, however, by pointing out that in several legal systems there are rules for determining the amount of damages ; some international conventions fix limits as to the amount of compensation (for example, conventions relating to carriage) ; the amount of damages in case of non-performance is often prescribed in the contract and grave difficulties would be created for the parties if these amounts had to be determined later by the court hearing the action.

By way of compromise the Group finally decided to refer in subparagraph (c) solely to rules of law in matters of assessment of damages, given that questions of fact will always be a matter for the court hearing the action.

The expression "consequences of breach" refers to the consequences which the law or the contract attaches to the breach of a contractual obligation, whether it is a matter of the liability of the party to whom the breach is attributable or of a claim to terminate the contract for breach. Any requirement of service of notice on the party to assume his liability also comes within this context.

According to subparagraph 1 (d), the law applicable to the contract governs the various ways of extinguishing obligations, and prescription and limitation of actions. This Article must be applied with due regard to the limited admission of severability (dépeçage) in Articles 3 and 4.

Subparagraph (e) also makes the consequences of nullity subject to the applicable law. The working party's principal objective in introducing this provision was to make the refunds which the parties have to pay each other subsequent to a finding of nullity of the contract subject to the applicable law.

Some delegations have indicated their opposition to this approach on the grounds that, under their legal systems, the consequences of nullity of the contract are non-contractual in nature. The majority of delegations have nevertheless said they are in favour of including such consequences within the scope of the law of contracts, but in order to take account of the opposition expressed provision had been made for any Contracting State to enter a reservation on this matter (Article 22 (1) (b)).

3. Article 10 (2) states that in relation to the manner of performance and the steps to be taken in the event of defective performance regard shall be had to the law of the country in which performance takes place.

This is a restriction which is often imposed in the national law of many countries as well as in several international conventions. Many jurists have supported and continue to support this restriction on the scope of the law applicable to the contract even when the contractual obligation is performed in a country other than that whose law is applicable.

What is meant, however, by "manner of performance" of an obligation ? It does not seem that any precise and uniform meaning is given to this concept in the various laws and in the differing views of learned writers. The Group did not for its part wish to give a strict definition of this concept. It will consequently be for the lex fori to determine what is meant by "manner of performance". Among the matters normally falling within the description of "manner of performance", it would seem that one might in any event mention the rules governing public holidays, the manner in which goods are to be examined, and the steps to be taken if they are refused (49).

Article 10 (2) says that a court may have regard to the law of the place of performance. This means that the court may consider whether such law has any relevance to the manner in which the contract should be performed and has a discretion whether to apply it in whole or in part so as to do justice between the parties.

Incapacity

The legal capacity of natural persons or of bodies corporate or unincorporate is in principle excluded from the scope of the Convention (Article 1 (2) (a) and (e)). This exclusion means that each Contracting State will continue to apply its own system of private international law to contractual capacity.

However, in the case of natural persons, the question of capacity is not entirely excluded. Article 11 is intended to protect a party who in good faith believed himself to be contracting with a person of full capacity and who, after the contract has been entered into, is confronted by the incapacity of the other contracting party. This anxiety to protect a party in good faith against the risk of a contract being held voidable or void on the ground of the other party's incapacity on account of the application of a law other than that of the place where the contract was concluded is clearly present in the countries which subject capacity to the law of the nationality (50).

A rule of the same kind is also thought necessary in the countries which make capacity subject to the law of the country of domicile. The only countries which could dispense with it are those wich subject capacity to the law of the place where the contract was entered into or to the law governing the substance of the contract.

Article 11 subjects the protection of the other party to the contract to very stringent conditions.

First, the contract must be concluded between persons who are in the same country. The Convention does not wish to prejudice the protection of a party under a disability where the contract is concluded at a distance, between persons who are in different countries, even if, under the law governing the contract, the latter is deemed to have been concluded in the country where the party with full capacity is.

Secondly, Article 11 is only to be applied where there is a conflict of laws. The law which, according to the private international law of the court hearing the case, governs the capacity of the person claiming to be under a disability must be different from the law of the country where the contract was concluded.

Thirdly, the person claiming to be under a disability must be deemed to have full capacity by the law of the country where the contract was concluded. This is because it is only in this case that the other party may rely on apparent capacity.

In principle these three conditions are sufficient to prevent the incapacitated person from pleading his incapacity against the other contracting party. This will not however be so "if the other party to the contract was aware of his incapacity at the time of the conclusion of the contract or was not aware thereof as a result of negligence". This wording implies that the burden of proof lies on the incapacitated party. It is he who must establish that the other party knew of his incapacity or should have known of it.

Article 12

Voluntary assignment

1. The subject of Article 12 is the voluntary assignment of rights.

Article 12 (1) provides that the mutual obligations of assignor and assignee under a voluntary assignment of a right against another person (the debtor) shall be governed by the law which under this Convention applies to the contract between the assignor and assignee.

Interpretation of this provision gives rise to no difficulty. It is obvious that according to this paragraph the relationship between the assignor and assignee of a right is governed by the law applicable to the agreement to assign.

Although the purpose and meaning of the provision leave hardly any room for doubt, one wonders why the Group did not draft it more simply and probably more elegantly. For example, why not say that the assignment of a right by agreement shall be governed in relations between assignor and assignee by the law applicable to that agreement.

Such a form of words had in fact been approved initially by most of the delegations, but it was subsquently abandoned because of the difficulties of interpretation which might have arisen in German law, where the expression "assignment" of a right by agreement includes the effects of it upon the debtor : this was expressly excluded by Article 12 (2).

The present wording was in fact finally adopted precisely to avoid a form which might lead to the idea that the law applicable to the agreement for assignment in a legal system in which it is understood as "Kausalgeschäft" also determines the conditions of validity of the assignment with respect to the debtor.

2. On the contrary, under the terms of Article 12 (2) it is the law governing the right to which the assignment relates which determines its assignability, the relationship between the assignee and the debtor, the conditions under which the assignment can be invoked against the debtor and any question whether the debtor's obligations have been discharged.

The words "conditions under which the assignment can be invoked" cover the conditions of transferability of the assignment as well as the procedures required to give effect to the assignment in relation to the debtor.

Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 2, the matters which it covers, with the sole exception of assignability, are governed, as regards relations between assignor and debtor if a contract exists between them, by the law which governs their contract in so far as the said matters are dealt with in that contract.

Subrogation

1. The substitution of one creditor for another may result both from the voluntary assignment of a right (or assignment properly so called) referred to in Article 12 and from the assignment of a right by operation of law following a payment made by a person other than the debtor.

According to the legislation in various Member States of the Community, "subrogration" involves the vesting of the creditor's rights in the person who, being obliged to pay the debt with or on behalf of others, had an interest in satisfying it : this is so under Article 1251-3 of the French Civil Code and Article 1203-3 of the Italian Civil Code. For example, in a contract of guarantee the guarantor who pays instead of the debtor succeeds to the rights of the creditor. The same occurs when a payment is made by one of a number of debtors who are jointly and severally liable or when an indivisible obligation is discharged.

Article 13 of the Convention embodies the conflict rule in matters of subrogation of a third party to the rights of a creditor. Having regard to the fact that the Convention applies only to contractual obligations, the Group thought it proper to limit the application of the rule adopted in Article 13 to assignments of rights which are contractual in nature. Therefore this rule does not apply to subrogation by operation of law when the debt to be paid has its origin in tort (for example, where the insurer succeeds to the rights of the insured against the person causing damage).

2. According to the wording of Article 13 (1), where a person (the creditor) has a contractual claim upon another (the debtor), and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, or has in fact satisfied the creditor in discharge of that duty, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether the third person is entitled to exercise against the debtor the rights which the creditor had against the debtor under the law governing their relationship and, if so, whether he may do so in full or only to a limited extent.

The law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor (for example, the law applicable to the contract of guarantee, where the guarantor has paid instead of the debtor) will therefore determine whether and to what extent the third person is entitled to exercise the rights of the creditor against the debtor according to the law governing their contractual relations.

In formulating the rule under analysis the Group made a point of considering situations in which a person has paid without being obliged so to do by contract or by law but having an economic interest recognized by law as anticipated by Article 1251-3 of the French Civil Code and Article 1203-3 of the Italian Civil Code. In principle the same rule applies to these situations, but the court has a discretion in this respect.

As regards the possibility of a partial subrogation such as that provided for by Article 1252 of the French Civil Code and by Article 1205 of the Italian Civil Code, it seems right that this should be subject to the law applicable to the subrogation.

In addition, when formulating Article 13 the Group envisaged the possibility that the legal relationship between the third party and the debtor was governed by a contract. This contract will obviously be governed by the law which is applicable to it by the terms of this Convention. Article 13 in no way affects this aspect of the relationship between the third party and the debtor.

3. Article 13 (2) extends the same rule in paragraph 1 to cases in which several person are liable for the same contractual obligation (co-debtors) and the creditor's interest has been discharged by one of them.

4. As well as the problem of voluntary assignment of rights and the problem of assignment of rights by operation of law (Articles 12 and 13), there exists the problem of assignment of duties. However, the Group did not wish to resolve this problem, because it is new and because there are still many uncertainties as to the solution to be given.

Burden of proof, etc.

Article 14 deals with the law to be applied to certain questions of evidence.

There is no rule of principle dealing with evidence in general. In the legal systems of the Contracting States, except as regards the burden of proof, questions of evidence (both as regards facts and acts intended to have legal effect and as regards foreign law) are in principle subject to the law of the forum. This principle is, however, subject to a certain number of exceptions which are not the same in all these legal systems. Since it was decided that only certain questions of evidence should be covered in Article 14, it was thought better not to bind the interpretation thereof by a general provision making the rules of evidence subject to the law of the forum on questions not decided by the Convention, such as, for example, the taking of evidence abroad or the evidential value of legal acts. In order that there should be no doubt as to the freedom retained by the States regarding questions of evidence not decided by the Convention, Article 1 (2) (h) excludes evidence and procedure from the scope of the Convention, expressly without prejudice to Article 14.

Two major questions have been covered and are each the subject of a separate paragraph. These are the burden of proof on the one hand and the recognition of modes of proving acts intended to have legal effect on the other. After considerable hesitation the Group decided not to deal with the problem of evidential value. A. Burden of proof

The first paragraph of Article 14 provides for the application of the law of the contract "to the extent that it contains, in the law of contract, rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof". Presumptions of law, relieving the party in whose favour they operate from the necessity of producing any evidence, are really rules of substance which in the law of contract contribute to making clear the obligations of the parties and therefore cannot be separated from the law which governs the contract. By way of example, where Article 1731 of the French Civil Code provides that "where no inventory of the state of the premises has been taken, the lessee shall be deemed to have received them in good tenantable repair and must, in the absence of proof to the contrary, restore them in such condition", the Article is in reality determining the obligation of the lessee to restore the let premises. It is therefore logical that the law of the contract should apply here.

The same observation applies to rules determining the burden of proof. By way of example, Article 1147 of the French Civil Code provides that a debtor who has failed to fulfil his obligation shall be liable for damages "unless he shows that this failure is due to an extraneous cause outside his control". This text determines the burden of proof between the parties. The creditor must prove that the obligation has not been fulfilled, the debtor must prove that the failure is due to an extraneous cause. But in dividing the burden, the text establishes the debtor's obligations on a vital point, since the debtor is liable for damages even if the failure to fulfil is not due to a proven fault on his part. The rule is accordingly a rule of substance which can only be subject to the law of the contract.

Nevertheless the text of the first paragraph of Article 14 does contain a restriction. The burden of proof is not totally subject to the law of the contract. It is only subject to it to the extent that the law of the contract determines it with regard to contractual obligations ("in the law of contract"), that is to say only to the extent to which the rules relating to the burden of proof are in effect rules of substance.

This is not always the case. Some legal systems recognize rules relating to the burden of proof, sometimes even classed as presumptions of law, which clearly are part of procedural law and which it would be wrong to subject to the law of the contract. This is the case, for example, with the rule whereby the claim of a party who appears is deemed to be substantiated if the other party fails to appear, or the rule making silence on the part of a party to an action with regard to facts alleged by the other party equivalent to an admission of those facts.

Such rules do not form part of "the law of contract" and accordingly do not fall within the choice of law rule established by Article 14 (1).

B. Admissibility of modes of proving acts intended to have legal effect

Paragraph 2 of Article 14 deals with the admissibility of modes of proving acts intended to have legal effect (in the sense of voluntas negotium).

The text provides for the application in the alternative of the law of the forum or of the law which determines the formal validity of the act. This liberal solution favouring proof of the act is already recognized in France and in the Benelux countries (51). It seems to be the only solution capable of reconciling the requirements of the law of the forum with the desire to respect the legitimate expectations of the parties at the time of concluding their act.

The law of the forum is normally employed to determine the means which may be used for proving an act intended to have legal effect, which in this context includes a contract. If, for example, that law allows a contract to be proved by witnesses, it should be followed, irrespective of any more stringent provisions on the point contained in the law governing the substance or formal validity of the act.

On the other hand, in the opposite case, if the law governing the formal validity of the act only requires oral agreement and allows such an agreement to be proved by witnesses, the expectations of parties who had relied on that law would be disappointed if such proof were to be held inadmissible solely on the ground that the law of the trial court required written evidence of all acts intended to have legal effect. The parties must therefore be allowed to employ the modes of proof recognized by the law governing formal validity.

Nevertheless this liberalism should not lead to imposing on the trial court modes of proof which its procedural law does not enable it to administer. Article 14 does not deal with the administration of modes of proof, which the legal system of each Contracting State makes subject to the law of the trial court. Admitting the application of a law other than that of the forum to modes of proof ought not to lead to the rules of the law of the forum, as regards the administration of the modes of proof, being rendered nugatory.

This is the explanation of the proviso which in substance enables a court, without reference to public policy, to disregard modes of proof which the law of procedure cannot generally allow, such as an affidavit, the testimony of a party or common knowledge. Consideration was also given to the case of rights subject to registration in a public register, holding that the authority charged with keeping that register could, owing to that provision, only recognize the modes of proof provided for by its own law.

Such being the general system adopted, a proviso had to be added regarding the law determining formal validity applicable as an alternative to the law of the forum.

The text refers to "any of the laws referred to in Article 9 under which that contract or act is formally valid". This expression means that if, for example, the act is formally valid under the law governing the substance of the contract but is not formally valid under the law of the place where it was done, the parties may employ only the modes of proof provided for by the first of these two laws, even if the latter is more liberal as regards proof. The reference in Article 14 (2) to the law governing formal validity is clearly based on the assumption that the law governing formal validity has been observed. On the other hand, if the act is formally valid according to both laws (lex causae and lex loci actus) mentioned in Article 9, the parties will be able to employ the modes of proof provided for by either of those laws.

C. There is no provision dealing with the evidential value of acts intended to have legal effect. The preliminary draft of 1972 contained a provision covering two questions derived, in Roman law countries, from the concept of evidential value ; the question how far a written document affords sufficient evidence of the obligations contained in it and the question of the modes of proof to add to or contradict the contents of the document - "outside and against the content" of such a document, according to the old phraseology of the Code Napoléon (Article 1341). Despite long discussion, no agreement could be reached between the delegations and it was therefore decided to leave the question of evidential value outside the scope of the Convention.

Exclusion of renvoi

This Article excludes renvoi.

It is clear that there is no place for renvoi in the law of contract if the parties have chosen the law to be applied to their contract. If they have made such a choice, it is clearly with the intention that the provisions of substance in the chosen law shall be applicable ; their choice accordingly excludes any possibility of renvoi to another law (52).

Renvoi is also excluded where the parties have not chosen the law to be applied. In this case the contract is governed, in accordance with Article 4 (1), by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected. Paragraph 2 introduces a presumption that that country is the country where the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has his habitual residence. It would not be reasonable for a court, despite this express localization, to subject the contract to the law of another country by introducing renvoi, solely because the rule of conflict of laws in the country where the contract was localized contained other connecting factors. This is equally so where the last paragraph of Article 4 applies and the court has decided the place of the contract with the aid of indications which seem to it decisive.

More generally, the exclusion of renvoi is justified in international conventions regarding conflict of laws. If the Convention attempts as far as possible to localize the legal situation and to determine the country with which it is most closely connected, the law specified by the conflicts rule in the Convention should not be allowed to question this determination of place. Such, moreover, has been the solution adopted since 1951 in the conventions concluded at The Hague.

Article 16

"Ordre public"

Article 16 contains a precise and restrictively worded reservation in favour of public policy ("ordre public").

First it is expressly stated that, in the abstract and taken as a whole, public policy is not to affect the law specified by the Convention. Public policy is only to be taken into account where a certain provision of the specified law, if applied in an actual case, would lead to consequences contrary to the public policy ("ordre public") of the forum. It may therefore happen that a foreign law, which might in the abstract be held to be contrary to the public policy of the forum, could nevertheless be applied, if the actual result of its being applied does not in itself offend the public policy of the forum.

Secondly, the result must be "manifestly" incompatible with the public policy of the forum. This condition, which is to be found in all the Hague Conventions since 1956, requires the court to find special grounds for upholding an objection (53).

Article 16 provides that it is the public policy of the forum which must be offended by the application of the specified law. It goes without saying that this expression includes Community public policy, which has become an integral part of the public policy ("ordre public") of the Member States of the European Community.

No retrospective effect

Article 17 means that the Convention has no retrospective effect on contracts already in existence. It applies only to contracts concluded after it enters into force, but the entry into force must be considered separately for each State since the Convention will not enter into force simultaneously in all the contracting States (see Article 29). Of course, there is no provision preventing a court of a contracting State with respect to which the Convention has not yet entered into force from applying it in advance unter the concept of ratio scripta.

Article 18

Uniform interpretation

This Article is based on a formula developed by the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law.

The draft revision of the uniform law on international sales and the preliminary draft of the Convention on prescription and limitation of actions in international sales contained the following provision : "In the interpretation and application of this Convention, regard shall be had to its international character and to the necessity of promoting uniformity". This provision, whose wording was slightly amended, has been incorporated in the United Nations Convention on contracts for the international sale of goods (Article 7) signed in Vienna on 11 April 1980.

Article 18 operates as a reminder that in interpreting an international convention regard must be had to its international character and that, consequently, a court will not be free to assimilate the provisions of the Convention, in so far as concerns their interpretation, to provisions of law which are purely domestic. It seemed that one of the advantages of this Article might be to enable parties to rely in their actions on decisions given in other countries.

It is within the spirit of this Article that a solution must be found to the problem of classification, for which, following the example of the Benelux uniform law, the French draft and numerous conventions of The Hague, the Convention has refrained from formulating a special rule.

Article 18 will retain its importance even if a protocol subjecting the interpretation of the Convention to the Court of Justice of the European Communities is drawn up pursuant to the Joint Declaration of the Representatives of the Governments made when the Convention was opened for signature on 19 June 1980.

States with more than one legal system

This Article is based on similar provisions contained in some of the Hague Conventions (see, for example, the Convention on the law applicable to matrimonial property regimes, Articles 17 and 18 and the Convention on the law applicable to agency, Articles 19 and 20).

According to the first paragraph, where a State has several territorial units each with its own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations, each of those units will be considered as a country for the purposes of the Convention. If, for example, in the case of Article 4, the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has his habitual residence in Scotland, it is with Scottish law that the contract will be deemed to be most closely connected.

Paragraph 2, which is of special concern to the United Kingdom, covers the case where the situation is connected with several territorial units in a single country but not with another State. In such a case there is a conflict of laws, but it is a purely domestic matter for the State concerned which consequently is under no obligation to resolve it by applying the rules of the Convention.

Precedence of Community law

This Article is intended to avoid the possibility of conflict between this Convention and acts of the Community institutions, by according precedence to the latter. The text is based on that of Article 52 (2) of the Convention of 27 September 1968 as revised by the Accession Convention of 9 October 1978.

The Community provisions which will have precedence over the Convention are, as regards their object, those which, in relation to particular matters, lay down rules of private international law with regard to contractual obligations. For example, the Regulation on conflict of laws with respect to employment contracts will, when it has been finally adopted, take precedence over the Convention.

The Governments of the Member States have, nevertheless, in a joint declaration, expressed the wish that these Community instruments will be consistent with the provisions of the Convention.

As regards the form which these instruments are to take, the Community provisions contemplated by Article 20 are not only acts of the institutions of the European Communities, that is to say principally the Regulations and the Directives as well as the Conventions concluded by those Communities, but also national laws harmonized in implementation of such acts. A law or regulation adopted by a State in order to make its legislation comply with a Directive borrows, as it were, from the Directive its Community force, thus justifying the precedence accorded to it over this Convention.

Finally, the precedence which Article 20 accords to Community law applies not only to Community law in force at the date when this Convention enters into force, but also to that adopted after the Convention has entered into force.

Relationship with other Conventions

This Article, which has its equivalent in the Hague Conventions on the law applicable to matrimonial property regimes (Article 20) and on the law applicable to agency (Article 22) means that this Convention will not prejudice the application of any other international agreement, present or future, to which a Contracting State is or becomes party, for example, to Conventions relating to carriage. This leaves open the possibility of a more far-reaching international unificatin with regard to all or part of the ground covered by this Convention.

This provision does not of course eliminate all possibility of difficulty arising from the combined application of this Convention and another concurrent Convention, especially if the latter contains a provision similar to that in Article 21. But the States which are parties to several Conventions must seek a solution to these difficulties of application without jeopardizing the observance of their international obligations.

Moreover, Article 21 must be read in conjunction with Articles 24 and 25. The former specifies the conditions under which a contracting State may become a party to a multilateral Convention after the date on which this Convention enters into force with respect thereto. The latter deals with the case where the conclusion of other Conventions would prejudice the unification achieved by this Convention.

Reservations

This Article indicates the reservations which may be made to the Convention, the reasons for which have been set out in this report as regards Articles 7 (1) and 10 (1) (e). Following the practice generally applied, in particular in the Hague Conventions, it lays down the procedure by means of which these reservations can be made or withdrawn.

TITLE III FINAL PROVISIONS

Unilateral adoption by a contracting State of a new choice of law rule

Article 23 is an unusual text since it allows the contracting States to make unilateral derogations from the rules of the Convention. This weakening of its mandatory force was thought desirable because of the very wide scope of the Convention and the very general character of most of its rules. The case was envisaged where a State found it necessary for political, economic or social reasons to amend a choice of law rule and it was thought desirable to find a solution sufficiently flexible to enable States to ratify the Convention without having to denounce it as soon as they were forced to disregard its rules on a particular point.

The possibility of making unilateral derogations from the Convention is, however, subject to certain conditions and restrictions.

First, derogation is only possible if it consists in adopting a new choice of law rule in regard to a particular category of contract. For example, Article 23 would not authorize a State to abandon the general principle of the Convention. But it would enable it to adopt, under the conditions specified, a particular choice of law rule different from that of the Convention with respect, for example, to contracts made by travel agencies or to contracts for correspondence courses where the specialist nature of the contract could justify this derogation from the common rule. It is of course understood that the derogation procedure shall only be imposed on States if the contract for which they wish to adopt a new choice of law rule falls within the scope of the Convention.

Secondly, such a derogation is subject to procedural conditions. The State which wishes to derogate from the Convention must inform the other signatory States through the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities. The latter shall, if a State so requests, arrange for consultation between the signatory States in order to reach unanimous agreement. If, within a period of two years, no State has requested consultation or no agreement has been able to be reached, the State may then amend its law in the manner indicated.

The Group considered whether this procedure should apply to situations where the contracting States would wish to adopt a rule of the kind referred to in Article 7 of the Convention, i.e. a mandatory rule which must be applied whatever the law applicable to the contract. It was considered that the States should not be bound to submit themselves to the Article 23 procedure before adopting such a rule. But to escape the application of Article 23 the rule in question must meet the criteria of Article 7 and be explicable by the strong mandatory character of the rule of substantive law which it lays down. It is not the intention that the contracting States should be able to avoid the conditions of Article 23 by disguising under the form of a mandatory rule of the Article 7 kind a rule of conflict dealing with matters whose absolute mandatory nature is not established.

New Conventions

The procedure for consultation imposed under Article 23 on a State intending to derogate from the Convention by amending its national law is also imposed on a State which wishes to derogate from the Convention on becoming a party to another Convention.

This system of "freedom under supervision" imposed on contracting States applies only to conventions whose main object or whose principal aim or one of whose principal aims is to lay down rules of private international law concerning any of the matters governed by this Convention. Consequently the States are free to accede to a Convention which consolidates the material law of such and such a contract, with regard, for example, to transport and which contains, as an ancillary provision, a rule of private international law. But, within the area thus defined, the consultation procedure applies even to Conventions which were open for signature before the entry into force of the present Convention.

Article 24 (2) further restricts the scope of the obligation imposed on the States by specifying that the procedure in the first paragraph need not apply: 1. if the object of the new Convention is to revise a former Convention. The opposite solution would have had the unfortunate effect of obstructing the modernization of existing Conventions;

2. if one or more contracting States or the European Communities are already parties to the new Convention;

3. if the new Convention is concluded within the framework of the European Treaties particularly in the case of a multilateral Convention to which one of the Communities is already party. These rules are in harmony with the precedence of Community law provided for under Article 20.

Article 24 therefore establishes a clear distinction between Conventions to which contracting States may freely become parties and those to which they may become parties only upon condition that they submit to consultation procedure.

For Conventions of the former class, Article 25 provides for the case where the conclusion of such agreements prejudiced the unification achieved by this Convention. If a contracting State considers that such is the case, it may request the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities to open consultation procedure. The text of the Article implies that the Secretary-General of the Council possesses a certain discretionary power. The Joint Declaration annexed to this Convention in fact provides that, even before the entry into force of this Convention, the States will confer together if one of them wishes to become a party to such a Convention.

For Conventions of the latter class, the consultation procedure is the same as that of Article 23 except that the period of two years is here reduced to one year.

Article 26

Revision

This Article provides for a possible revision of the Convention. It is identical with Article 67 of the Convention of 27 September 1968.

Articles 27 to 33

Usual protocol clauses

Article 27 defines the territories of the Member States to which the Convention is to apply (cf. Article 60 of the revised Convention of 27 September 1968). Articles 28 and 29 deal with the opening for signature of the Convention and its ratification. Article 28 does not make any statement on the methods by which each contracting State will incorporate the provisions of the Convention into its national law. This is a matter which by international custom is left to the sovereign discretion of States. Each contracting State may therefore give effect to the Convention either by giving it force of law directly or by including its provisions into its own national legislation in a form appropriate to that legislation. The most noteworthy provision is that of Article 29 (1) which provides for entry into force after seven ratifications. It appeared that to require ratification by all nine contracting States might result in delaying entry into force for too long a period.

Article 30 lays down a duration of 10 years, automatically renewable for five-year periods. For States which ratify the Convention after its entry into force, the period of 10 years or five years to be taken into consideration is that which is running for the first States in respect of which the Convention entered into force (Article 29 (1)). Article 30 (3) makes provision for denunciation in manner similar to the Hague Conventions (see for example Article 28 Agency Convention). Such a denunciation will take effect on expiry of the period of 10 years or five years as the case may be (cf. Article 30 (3)). This Article has no equivalent in the Convention of 27 September 1968. The difference is explained by the fact that this Convention, unlike that of 1968, is not directly based on Article 220 of the Treaty of Rome. It is a Convention freely concluded between the States of the Community and not imposed by the Treaty.

Articles 31 and 33 entrust the management of the Convention (deposit of the Convention and notification to the signatory States) to the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

No provision is made for third States to accede to the Convention. The question was discussed by the Group but it was unable to reach agreement. In these circumstances, if a third State asked to accede to the Convention, there would have to be consultation among the Member States.

On the other hand a solution was found to the position, vis-à-vis the Convention, of States which might subsequently become members of the European Community.

The Group considered that the Convention itself could not deal with this question as it is a matter which falls within the scope of the Accession Convention with new members. Accordingly it simply drew up a joint declaration by the contracting States expressing the view that new Member States should be under an obligation also to accede to this Convention.

Protocol relating to the Danish Statute on Maritime Law - Article 169

The Danish Statute on Maritime Law is a uniform law common to the Scandinavian countries. Due to the method applied in Scandinavian legal cooperation it is not based upon a Convention but a result of the simultaneous introduction in the Parliaments of identical bills.

Article 169 of the Statute embodies a number of choice of law rules. These rules are partly based upon the bills of lading Convention 1924 as amended by the 1968 Protocol (The Hague - Visby rules). To the extent that that is the case, they are upheld as a result of Article 21 of the present Convention, even after its ratification by Denmark.

The rule in Article 169, however, provides certain additional choice of law rules with respect to the applicable law in matters of contracts of carriage by sea. These could have been retained by Denmark under Article 21 if the Scandinavian countries had cooperated by means of Conventions. It has been accepted that the fact that another method of cooperation has been followed should not prevent Denmark from retaining this result of Scandinavian cooperation in the field of uniform legislation. The rule in the Protocol permitting revision of Article 169 without following the procedure prescribed in Article 23 corresponds to the rule in Article 24 (2) of the Convention with respect to revision of other Conventions to which the States party to this Convention are also party.

Four of these Directives are already in force. The first, issued on 9 March 1968 (OJ No L 65, 14.3.1968), concerns disclosure, the extent to which the company is bound by acts done on its behalf, and nullity, in relation to public limited companies. The second, issued on 13 December 1976 (OJ No L 26, 31.1.1977), concerns the formation of public limited companies and the maintenance and alteration of their capital. The third, issued on 9 October 1978 (OJ No L 295, 20.10.1978), deals with company mergers, and the fourth, issued on 25 July 1978 (OJ No L 222, 14.8.1978), relates to annual accounts. Four other proposals for Directives made by the Commission are currently before the Council. They concern the structure of "sociétés anonymes" (OJ No C 131, 13.12. 1972), the admission of securities to quotation (OJ No C 131, 13.12.1972), consolidated accounts (OJ No C 121, 2.6.1976) and the minimum qualifications of persons who carry out legal audits of company accounts (OJ No C 112, 13.5. 1978). The second category comprises the Conventions provided for by Article 220 of the EEC Treaty. One of these concerns the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons. It was signed at Brussels on 29 February 1968 (the text was published in Supplement No 2 of 1969 to the Bulletin of the European Communities). The draft of a second Convention will shortly be submitted to the Council ; it concerns international mergers. Finally, work has progressed with a view to creating a Statute for European companies. This culminated in the proposal for a Regulation on the Statute for European companies, dated 30 June 1970 (OJ No C 124, 10.10.1970). Text of the 1st Interpretation Protocol

First Protocol on the interpretation of the 1980 Convention by the Court of Justice (consolidated version) / 1980 Rome Convention

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The signing on 29 November 1996 of the Convention on the accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden to the Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations and to the two Protocols on its interpretation by the Court of Justice has made it desirable to produce a consolidated version of the Rome convention and of those two Protocols.

These texts are accompanied by three Declarations, one made in 1980 with regard to the need for consistency between measures to be adopted on choice-of-law rules by the Community and those under the Convention, a second, also made in 1980, on the interpretation of the Convention by the Court of Justice and a third, made in 1996, concerning compliance with the procedure provided for in Article 23 of the Rome Convention as regards carriage of goods by sea.

The text printed in this edition was drawn up by the General Secretariat of the Council, in whose archives the originals of the instruments concerned are deposited. It should be noted, however, that this text has no binding force. The official texts of the instruments consolidated are to be found in the following Official Journals.

Second Protocol conferring on the Court of Justice powers to interpret the 1980 Convention (consolidated version) / 1980 Rome Convention

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The signing on 29 November 1996 of the Convention on the accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden to the Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations and to the two Protocols on its interpretation by the Court of Justice has made it desirable to produce a consolidated version of the Rome convention and of those two Protocols.

These texts are accompanied by three Declarations, one made in 1980 with regard to the need for consistency between measures to be adopted on choice-of-law rules by the Community and those under the Convention, a second, also made in 1980, on the interpretation of the Convention by the Court of Justice and a third, made in 1996, concerning compliance with the procedure provided for in Article 23 of the Rome Convention as regards carriage of goods by sea.

The text printed in this edition was drawn up by the General Secretariat of the Council, in whose archives the originals of the instruments concerned are deposited. It should be noted, however, that this text has no binding force. The official texts of the instruments consolidated are to be found in the following Official Journals.

COUNCIL

on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the Rome Convention of 19 June 1980 on the law applicable to contractual obligations

(signed in Brussels on 19 December 1988)

Professor of European Community Law at the University of Naples

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION

1. Some eight years after the signing of the Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations, and while the Convention has still not entered into force, the Member States of the European Communities have finally followed up the intentions they stated at the time and have given the Court of Justice specific powers to interpret the Convention [FN 1].

In their "joint declaration' attached to the Convention the Member States "desiring to ensure that the Convention is applied as effectively as possible' had said that they were "anxious to prevent differences of interpretation of the Convention from impairing its unifying effect'. Consequently, they declared themselves ready "to examine the possibility of conferring jurisdiction in certain matters on the Court of Justice of the European Communities and, if necessary, to negotiate an agreement to this effect' (and "to arrange meetings at regular intervals between their representatives').

Negotiations were set in hand immediately, but only on 19 December 1988 did the Member States sign, in Brussels, two Protocols on the matter, viz.: "the first Protocol on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the European Communities of the Convention' and "the second Protocol conferring on the Court of Justice of the European Communities certain powers to interpret the Convention' (OJ No L 48, 20. 2. 1989).

Thus the Rome Convention too, like other "Community' Conventions, was provided in advance with the formal instrument needed to give the Court of Justice of the European Communities interpretative powers and so strengthen the possibility of its uniform application.

At the same time, and indeed because of this, practical effect could be given to the Convention's "Community' connection, i.e. to its institutional link with the Community legal system. In this particular instance this result was even more significant, since the Rome Convention, unlike the precedents in the matter, falls outside the scope of application of Article 220 of the EEC Treaty.

Finally, it proved possible to give continuity and substance to a now increasingly significant procedure in this field and indeed to provide it with openings for further possibilities of development, thanks to the originality of the solutions adopted.

However, as for the precedents referred to, drawing up the Protocols on the interpretative powers of the Court of Justice in respect of the Rome Convention did not prove to be at all easy. Everything was discussed at length: the need and/or the desirability of providing for such powers; the technique to be followed in the matter; the scope and conditions for exercising such powers; the involvement of all the Member States, etc. The duration and the vicissitudes of the negotiations, the use of two separate legal instruments, the specific solutions outlined within them, and so on, are clear confirmation of such difficulties.

However, while certain even quite important aspects of the two Protocols betray these difficulties and raise a number of doubts, the final result of the lengthy and tortuous negotiations may be considered favourable overall. This is not only because the way has nonetheless been cleared for interpretative action by the Court of Justice, with the more general implications which have been mentioned and which will be returned to, but also because such a result was achieved in respect of a more complex and controversial situation than those tackled in the past. In addition, the danger of a lull in the development of the procedure referred to has been avoided and indeed, in some respects, a contribution has been made to actually consolidating and strengthening the procedure.

2. In order to give a clearer picture of the special nature of the solution adopted in the Protocols under review this Report is divided into two parts. Part One (sections 3 to 30) looks back over the practice followed prior to the Protocols and discards the terms of the negotiations and the motives that led the Member States to make substantial changes vis-à-vis that practice. Part Two (sections 31 to 41) comments on the separate articles of the two Protocols.

PART ONE

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

I. THE PRACTICE PRIOR TO THE PROTOCOLS

A. Origins and development

3. Precisely because the two Protocols being examined fall in with a practice which is unvarying with respect to its aims although multifarious in its outward forms, it would appear advisable to begin with a brief summary of the development of that practice.

It will be recalled that the practice concerned began to emerge in the 1960s, at the time of the negotiations for the preparation of certain Conventions between Member States in the framework of Article 220 of the EEC Treaty, in particular the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons, the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgements in civil and commercial matters and the Convention on bankruptcy, winding-up arrangements, compositions and similar proceedings.

As known, of these Conventions only the second is in force. The first, signed in Brussels by the then six Member States of the European Communities on 29 February 1968, subsequently came to grief over the ratification procedures. Negotiations on the third Convention led to an extensive preliminary draft in 1970, but after various ups and downs (some of which we shall shortly return to) these negotiations were shelved [FN 2].

The second Convention, however, was more successful, as already mentioned. After being signed in Brussels on 27 September 1968 by the original Member States, it was progressively extended to the new Member States with the Luxembourg Convention of 9 October 1978 for the accession of Denmark, the United Kingdom and Ireland; with the Luxembourg Convention of 25 October 1982 for the accession of Greece; and finally with the Donostia-San Sebastian Convention of 26 May 1989 for the accession of Spain and Portugal [FN 3].

4. In all the instances mentioned so far, a Declaration was attached to the Conventions (or draft Conventions) in which the Signatory States, in terms and for purposes substantially similar to those of the Declaration attached to the Rome Convention, said that they were ready "to examine the possibility of conferring jurisdiction in certain matters on the Court of Justice of the Eruopean Communities and, if necessary, to negotiate an agreement to this effect'.

This subsequently happened for the two Brussels Conventions referred to of 29 February and 27 September 1968 as a result of the signing of the two Luxembourg Protocols of 3 June 1971, only one of which, as is known, has entered into force, viz. the Protocol to the Brussels Convention on the enforcement of judgements [FN 4].

In both Protocols, however, the powers of the Court of Justice to interpret the texts of the Agreements are defined in accordance with the scheme laid out in Article 177 of the EEC Treaty. Indeed, the Protocol to the first of the Conventions in question involves barely more than a straightforward transposition of that provision. For the other, however, some modifications had to be made, for reasons not unlike those underlying the innovations introduced by the Protocols being examined.

5. Following the precedents referred to, further opportunities arose for providing that such powers be given to the Court of Justice in draft conventions and conventions drawn up subsequently, including some whose subject-matter lay outside the scope of Article 220 of the EEC Treaty.

This is the case, in particular, for the draft Convention on bankruptcy, winding-up arrangements, compositions and similar proceedings, established in 1980 as a subsequent development of the preliminary draft of 1970 mentioned above. However, instead of the aforementioned Declaration attached to the preliminary draft on the powers of the Court of Justice to interpret the Convention, the 1980 draft makes use of the precedent constituted by the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol and inserts directly in the Convention itself provisions corresponding almost word for word to those of the Protocol (Articles 70 to 74). As said, however, negotiations on the Community Convention on bankruptcy are deadlocked for the time being [FN 5].

This is also the case for the Community Patent Convention, signed in Luxembourg on 15 December 1975 (OJ No L 17, 26. 1. 1976), which directly embodies a provision giving the Court of Justice powers to interpret the Convention (Article 73). As is known, however, the entry into force of the Convention ran into numerous difficulties, with the result that in order to improve the chances of success it was considered desirable to make certain changes and additions to the Convention at conferences held in Luxembourg from 4 to 18 December 1985 and from 11 to 15 December 1989. The latter led to the Agreement on the Community patent, concluded in Luxembourg on 15 December 1989 [FN 6].

As regards the aspect which interests us here, these recent additions also have a significant bearing on the Court of Justice's interpretative powers, which are now partially replaced by those of the Common Appeal Court, set up on that occasion. The latter is, however, also required, in certain cases, to submit questions for preliminary rulings to the Court of Justice, while in other cases the national courts have the responsibility for so doing, in accordance with the schemes defined in the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol (Articles 2 to 5 of the 1989 Agreement). It should also be pointed out that the idea-subsequently taken over and actually put into effect for the Rome Convention-of providing for not one but two separate texts on the powers of the Court of Justice was first defined precisely in connection with the Community Patent Convention, and for exactly the same reasons as will be seen later in respect of the Protocols being examined.

B. Reasons

6. The reasons underlying the practice referred to above are so obvious that they require no more than a brief reference.

As is known, this practice has been developing mainly in relation to "Community' Conventions, the term used roughly to describe those Conventions between Member States intended to achieve objectives of importance for the European Communities. It is also known that while they may deal with matters which are not directly the subject of Community treaties and while they retain essential characteristics peculiar to international agreements of the traditional kind, there are aspects to those Conventions which link them to the Community legal system in a special way. They are in fact aimed at setting up between the Member States of the European Communities a complex of common rules (substantive or procedural), which in a way seek to supplement the system of rules already established or to be established pursuant to the Community Treaties and "secondary' legislation, in line with, and with a view to, the general process of integration, in respect of which the creation of as uniform a "legal area' as is possible obviously constitutes a useful and, in some respects, indispensable instrument.

It is unlikely that this will be disputed as regards the Conventions which refer to Article 220, since the same rule links them to the Community legal system by making provision for them to be concluded between all Member States (and only between them) "so far as is necessary', i.e. in accordance with the achievement of the objectives of the EEC.

The same may, however, be said in respect of other Conventions between Member States which, although they go beyond the provisions of Article 220, may also be regarded as contributing towards the achievement of Community objectives. This is particularly so if such objectives are understood in a broad sense and in the dynamic and evolving prospect of the process of Community integration. In fact, in the light of the developments which have taken place in that process over a period and of its obvious tendency to grow, the listing of fields given in Article 220 appears less and less crucial for a Convention to be described as a "Community' Convention.

Moreover, various indications, albeit of different kinds and degrees of importance, provide evidence of the Community link in such Conventions. Reference may be made, for example, to the Commission's role in taking the initiative and providing a constant impetus for negotiations in this respect (in the case of the Rome Convention, that role has even taken the form of the Commission adopting official positions) [FN 7].

It may also be recalled that such Conventions are concluded between all the Member States, between the Member States alone and between the Member States "meeting within the Council'. Attention may also be drawn to the tendency to seek legal bases in the Treaty itself in order to provide rules on the matter by a Community act rather than through the Convention (see references in the Commission opinion referred to above as regards the harmonization of private international law; the trend has, however, already affected other sectors).

Finally, these links are also formally confirmed by those Community texts in which express reference is made, in addition to the Conventions provided for in Article 220 of the EEC Treaty, to "Conventions ... that are inseparable from the attainment of the objectives' of the Treaty "and thus linked to the Community legal order' [FN 8].

7. But above all what stands out, in respect of the aims mentioned, is the tendency to give the Court of Justice specific powers to interpret the Conventions referred to.

Such a trend undoubtedly corresponds in the first place to a requirement common to uniform-law Conventions. It is in fact generally acknowledged that the interpretation of such Conventions must take account of their international nature and of their specific unifying function. In the case of the Rome Convention, but not only for that Convention, the requirement mentioned above is actually expressed formally in a provision [FN 9].

It is also known, however, that despite this the effective application of those Conventions and their unifying function are often at risk of being thwarted as a result of differences in the way they are interpreted in the national legal systems of the Contracting States. The specific features of national legal traditions, the tendency of judges to use the legal categories most familiar to them, variations in the different language versions, the different techniques for transposing a Convention into the national legal systems, to mention only the main reasons, invariably lead to differences in the interpretative process, with the unfortunate consequences referred to. Hence the usefulness of setting up machinery capable of ensuring that the Conventions concerned are interpreted in terms which are as uniform as possible.

The point, however, which needs to be given most emphasis here is that in the cases being discussed giving the Court jurisdiction is not intended merely to meet such concerns. The aim is in fact also, if not above all, to give formal expression and authentic substance to that aforementioned Community connection in the Conventions being examined. The aim is then not merely the general one of setting up a single centre for interpretation, but above all to entrust that task to the body which is the main guarantor of the uniform interpretation of the entire Community legal system and which, because of its position in the institutional hierarchy and the nature of its functions, is more capable than any other body of ensuring the organic link between the Conventions and that system. Moreover, it is precisely because of the role thus given the Court in this matter that in legal doctrine there is a growing tendency to construe Conventions and Community law as a single body of rules, in the sense that the Conventions become incorporated as fully-fledged elements in the Community legal system, as sub-systems present in it [FN 10].

If we then add to all these considerations the positive experiences gained over the past few years in the practical application both of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and of the 1971 Protocol, the reasons for the growing trend to give the Court of Justice jurisdiction in the matter will appear more obvious still [FN 11].

C. Attempts to provide an institutional framework

8. As has been said, approval for such a trend was already apparent on the occasion of the two 1968 Brussels Conventions. The fact that with these Conventions the era of the Conventions based on Article 220 was beginning (or was thought to be beginning) and that the problem of the powers of the Court arose simultaneously for two Conventions even raised the question whether it was preferable to take a decision on conferring those powers on a case-by-case basis or to draw up a general act applicable to all Conventions concluded or to be concluded on the basis of Article 220 [FN 12].

The latter hypothesis was rejected because it was thought preferable to define the Court's powers in each case according to its specific requirements.

However, the idea that continuity and stability should be given to the procedure remained and indeed grew stronger with the emergence of new requirements: the extension of Community Conventions beyond the area defined by Article 220; the recurrent difficulty in achieving the consensus of the Member States; the existence of problems peculiar to some States, and so on.

9. Amongst the first pressing requests along these lines were those made by the Court of Justice itself, which on various occasions expressed an opinion in favour of being given the powers in question, as it considered them necessary to "ensure both the unified nature of Community jurisdiction and the uniform application of Conventions in all Member States'.

Nor did the Court seem to be discouraged by the well-known difficulties deriving from the increasing workload with which it was already faced at that time. Indeed, the clearest indication of support for those powers in the terms just referred to was officially expressed in a memorandum which the Court sent to the Council of the European Communities on 21 July 1978 to ask for a series of measures to be taken which were needed to improve the way the Court operated, with a view, likewise, to the conferring on it of such powers.

The Court's request met with immediate sympathy within the Council, in which the German delegation proposed endowing the Court of Justice with general jurisdiction in the field of private and commercial law Conventions to which all the Member States were parties, but not third countries, and which were related to the aims of the Community. The Council took note of the proposal at its meeting on 9 Oktober 1978, but no further action was taken.

10. The idea that such powers should be conferred in general terms, albeit under arrangements to be defined, was not, however, abandoned. It reappeared on various occasions, even in official texts.

Thus the "Solemn Declaration on European Union', approved by the European Council in Stuttgart on 19 June 1983, proclaimed in point 2.5 that "taking account of the respective constitutional provisions in their States, the Heads of State or Government agree to consider, on a case-by-case basis, the inclusion, as appropriate, in international Conventions between Member States, of a clause conferring on the Court of Justice appropriate jurisdiction with regard to the interpretation of the texts'.

In turn, the report prepared by the ad hoc Committee for Institutional Affairs (the "Dooge' Committee) suggested that the Court of Justice "must be given jurisdiction for the interpretation of agreements concluded within the ambit of the Treaties as far as possible by means of a standard clause' (point III, paragraph D).

Finally, the idea also resurfaced to some extent during the Intergovernmental Conference which drew up the Single European Act, where there was talk of following up the statements mentioned.

But in the end no proposals were put forward in this connection.

11. The preparatory work for the Protocols being examined was thus carried out without any opportunity to refer, for those aspects just mentioned, to a legal framework already defined in general terms. Consequently the usual problems in the matter had to be faced, although obviously the abovementioned procedure had significant effects.

II. NEGOTIATIONS ON THE TWO PROTOCOLS

A. Introductory comments

12. In point of fact the first signs of the difficulties attending the negotiations were already apparent before the signing of the Rome Convention. When work on the draft Convention was finally concluded, after more than 10 years' discussions, the text contained no reference to the Court's jurisdiction, nor did it have annexed to it, as the other "Community' Conventions did, the aforementioned joint declaration on that jurisdiction.

The Commission then considered it necessary to draw up an opinion on the matter (see section 6), drawing attention to a number of shortcomings in the draft and especially the one just mentioned. In particular it said that it regarded it as essential not only that the Court be given jurisdiction, but also that the rules governing that jurisdiction be enacted in the body of the Convention by incorporating a provision based on Article 177 of the EEC Treaty. It was willing to accept a Protocol on the lines of that of 1971 concerning the Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement only as an alternative.

13. The Joint Declaration was adopted in partial accommodation of the Commission's request. However, as is normally the case, it contains no commitment on the part of the Member States to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Justice but merely a statement of their readiness to do so.

Specific negotiations were therefore necessary to give practical effect to the declared readiness; these began in June 1980, immediately after the signing of the Rome Convention and extended over many years in the various Council bodies, in particular the ad hoc Working Party on Private International Law.

14. Certain differences which proved difficult to bridge emerged during the negotiations, even though the Court of Justice itself, whose opinion had been expressly sought, had from the outset been favourable to extending the solution adopted for the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol to this case.

Moreover, certain Member States made it clear that they would not ratify the Convention until it was certain that jurisdiction would be conferred on the Court of Justice.

After various vicissitudes and periods of stalemate, the deadlock was finally broken in 1987. It was then possible fairly rapidly to draw up the two Protocols and for them to be signed at the end of 1988.

B. General problems

15. Some of the problems discussed during the negotiations bore specifically on the Protocols under examination or were posed in specific terms in relation to them; however, others were substantially the same as those that had arisen over the previous Protocols and had thus already been solved.

This meant that the discussion of those problems could be circumscribed and indeed in a number of cases the problems taken as solved.

16. Firstly, there was little doubt about whether conferral on the Court of Justice of powers not provided for in the Treaties required recourse to the relevant procedure for revision of the EEC Treaty laid down in Article 236, or whether other means could be used, in particular that of unanimous agreement among the Member States.

This issue had already arisen during negotiations on the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol and the solution then adopted had been that recourse to Article 236 was unnecessary. It was considered that application of Article 236 was necessary only where there was direct amendment to the text of the Treaty and/or an effect on the structure and operation of the Court. In this case, there was to be no amendment to the Treaty provisions relating to the Court of Justice, but rather an "extension' of the Court's jurisdiction: something was thus being "added', but the existing situation was not being changed. This also applied to the nature and subject of the jurisdiction being established, since this was wholly consistent with another already existing jurisdiction and related to a Convention which bore on the objectives of the EEC Treaty [FN 13].

It must, however, be objected that this solution appears somewhat forced and shows scant regard for Article 4 of the EEC Treaty ("each institution shall act within the limits of the powers conferred upon it by this Treaty'). Indeed, it seems difficult to deny the existence, in the cases under scrutiny, of an actual change in the overall picture of the Court's powers as defined by the EEC Treaty, since the powers being conferred are "new', "different' and far from insubstantial. On a more general level too the subtle and arguable distinction between "changing' and "extending' the Court's powers led to the risk, given its ambiguity, of making the interpretation of Article 236 still more uncertain, and even of restricting its scope. It is, however, a well-known fact that the Court of Justice favours the broadest application of that provision, inasmuch as the procedure it establishes offers specific institutional guarantees and lies wholly within the Community system [FN 14].

Nevertheless, the above solution, adopted for the 1971 Protocol, prevailed, in particular because of the scope it allows for procedural simplification. It should be emphasized that this solution subsequently received general acceptance, i.e. irrespective of the connection between the Conventions concerned and Article 220, which could also to some extent have mitigated the requirement to apply Article 236. It is for this reason that it has been extended, without further discussion, to the subsequent agreements and hence also to the Protocols under examination.

17. Neither has there been any challenge to the principle whereby even where an ad hoc agreement is used rather than the Article 236 procedure, powers are conferred on the Court of Justice by all Member States, since the powers of a Community institution, as defined by the Treaty, are affected.

While there were some reservations on the argument that Conventions in the areas mentioned in Article 220 of the EEC Treaty (and a fortiori others) may, if it is impossible to proceed under the terms of that Article, be concluded within the time specified between Member States only, it is undisputed that the unanimous agreement of the Member States is required for Court of Justice jurisdiction to be established. However, this does not preclude, as will be seen for the Protocols under examination, more sophisticated solutions in cases where unanimity is more difficult to achieve.

18. In the absence of a general solution regarding the techniques for conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Justice (see section 8 et seq.), account was taken of the specific nature of the case and as a result here, too, the procedure was to draw up special Protocols.

There was also in fact a suggestion that an ad hoc provision should be inserted in the body of the Rome Convention. This was the solution openly favoured by the Commission itself in its opinion of 17 March 1980 (see section 6), and there was no lack of precedents for it (see section 5).

However, this idea was soon dismissed: in view of the continuing reservations on the proposed establishment of Court of Justice jurisdiction it seemed advisable not to prejudice the negotiations on the Rome Convention for the sake of a point which clearly required further discussion and consideration.

19. Lastly, as regards the arrangements and conditions governing the exercise by the Court of the jurisdiction conferred on it, the possibility of merely extending Article 177 of the EEC Treaty, as was substantially the case for the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons, was not even considered.

It was decided instead to follow the precedent of the 1971 Protocol to the Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement, which contains various adaptations to the model provided by Article 177 of the EEC Treaty. The Protocols under examination in fact depart even more substantially from that model, as we shall see.

C. Problems specific to the Rome Convention

20. As already noted, however, the Member States' discussions on the preparation of the Protocols under scrutiny focused not so much on the general questions so far presented as on issues more strictly related to the special nature of the case in point, and in particular the following :

(a) whether it was necessary or desirable to confer on the Court of Justice the task of uniform interpretation of the Rome Convention; and, if so, on what particular conditions to effect the conferral so as to take account of the specific nature of the Convention;

(b) how to overcome some Member States' objective difficulties in agreeing to that conferral; these related to problems which were not new but which were rendered more complex by certain aspects of this case, in particular the fact that there was no connection between the Rome Convention and Article 220.

21. (a) On this first point it has already been stated that from the outset, in the negotiations on the preparation of the Convention, the misgivings on the proposal to provide for Court of Justice jurisdiction had been stronger than in other cases. The last-minute addition of the oft-mentioned Joint Declaration smoothed out the immediate difficulties but did not remove a number of Member States' reservations.

22. Apart from reservations regarding the premature nature of the exercice (the Rome Convention was not, and is still not, in force), the main objection raised was that the Convention did not fall within the scope of Article 220 of the EEC Treaty. Thus the connection with Community objectives was to be considered more tenuous and above all it appeared less urgent to provide for interpretative machinery to reflect that connection than had been the case for the 1971 Protocols which related to Conventions based on Article 220.

It was argued in reply to this objection that the choices made with regard to those Protocols had not been exclusively, or indeed even chiefly, based on the relationship between the individual Conventions and Article 220, because the main purpose seemed to be to ensure the uniform interpretation of the Convention and to achieve this through the Court of Justice. Subsequent practice has in fact confirmed the justice of this view, since there has been a growing tendency, also as regards the aspects examined here, to narrow the differences between Conventions based on Article 220 and those which are not so based but nevertheless relate to the achievement of Community objectives (see section 6 et seq.). It has also been seen that in the proposals under discussion here regarding institutionalization of the Court's jurisdiction, no distinction was made between those Conventions (see section 8 et seq.).

A more specific argument was that the Rome Convention was "the logical complement' to the Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement and that it was "precisely because of the numerous framework provisions and the imprecision of many of the legal concepts employed' that it needed to be interpreted in a uniform manner [FN 15].

23. Another, more specific, objection was that the subject and characteristics of the Rome Convention made provision for Court of Justice jurisdiction undesirable.

In particular, it was pointed out that the Convention was universal in nature (Article 2), i.e. it was also applicable to contracts having no connection with the Community Member States, except in that the disputes arising from them were subject to the Courts of one of those States. The jurisdiction of the Court of Justice should not therefore be imposed on parties who might not even be aware of the Court's existence.

In some way related to this objection were the fears expressed by some Member States that the tendency, widespread in international commercial practice, to accord their courts jurisdiction in disputes relating to "international contracts' might be undermined. It was thought that the prospect of such disputes having to undergo further trial (i.e. in the Court of Justice) might encourage traditional clients of those Community fora to go elsewhere in order to avoid more protracted, expensive and risky proceedings.

To counter the first of these objections, it was argued that the situations envisaged were in principle to be regarded as exceptional and did not constitute the Convention's main frame of reference.

In reply to both objections, it was pointed out that while they could lead, as in fact they did, to a search for appropriate solutions to the difficulties raised, they could not be allowed to result in failure to meet the requirements necessitating the conferral of jurisdiction on the Court of Justice.

24. Less weight was given to certain objections which had received particularly close attention during the negotiations on the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol.

We refer in particular to the fear that Court of Justice intervention might give scope for the parties to engage in delaying tactics or for other abuse and lead to overly-protracted proceedings. In practice, the application of the 1971 Protocol had already shown such fears to be groundless.

We also refer to the objections that had led the authors of the 1971 Protocol to exclude referrals to the Court of Justice by courts of first instance. The main purpose of that exclusion had been to prevent too many cases, unimportant rulings and minor points being submitted for the Court's interpretation [FN 16]. Although legal authors had countered point by point the grounds for those fears, and the Commission and some delegations challenged the wisdom of the exclusion, it was virtually never seriously questioned for the Protocols under examination [FN 17].

25. (b) The other problem referred to [section 20(b)] arose from the difficulties encountered by some Member States in agreeing to the conferral of the new jurisdiction on the Court of Justice.

This was the case, in particular, for Ireland; the Irish Constitution [Article 34(1)] is generally interpreted to mean that it is not possible to refer to courts other than the national courts (hence also to supranational courts) matters which fall within the jurisdiction of the national courts.

This problem had, when the Treaties were ratified, been expressly resolved with regard to the jurisdiction conferred on the Court of Justice under the Community Treaties but of course only insofar as that jurisdiction was concerned. In the case of the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol, it had been possible to rely on the fact that this referred to a Convention formally based on the EEC Treaty. This reasoning could clearly not be used for the Rome Convention, nor for all the other Conventions (e.g. the Community Patent Convention) which likewise have no formal connection with Article 220 or any other Treaty provision which could constitute their legal basis. Nor did it seem feasible to regard the Rome Convention for these purposes as a mere extension of the Brussels Convention.

The problem thus appeared difficult to solve, since on the one hand amendment of the Irish Constitution did not, and does not, seem an immediate possibility (see section 36) and on the other, the Court's jurisdiction under discussion could only be established, as already mentioned (see section 17), with the unanimous agreement of the Member States.

D. Solutions proposed

26. In the course of the long negotiations, various solutions were proposed, nearly all comprising variants, to overcome the difficulties described above.

(a) On the first of the above mentioned problems, as referrals to the Court of Justice by courts of first instance were excluded and as everyone accepted the procedure of petition for review in the interest of the law, discussion focused on possible referral by courts of last instance and appeal courts.

There were naturally attempts to put forward again as such the solution adopted in the 1971 Protocol (mandatory referral for the former, only optional referral for the latter). However, these came up against the difficulties described earlier and, despite the persistence of certain delegations, it was very soon apparent that they had no real chance of success.

Attention focused instead on the search for solutions which could reconcile the coherence of the system established by that Protocol with the need to overcome the objections to its extension to this case. In this connection it did in fact become immediately clear that some delegations were willing to withdraw their reservations only if the demands they had put forward (see section 23) were suitably met. These involved either restricting the range of courts empowered to refer a question of interpretation to the Court of Justice, or limiting the number of situations in which such referral was compulsory, and in any event making referral conditional on the prior agreement of the parties to the proceedings.

Various solutions were proposed, viz. that such agreement should be required only in the case of appeal courts and/or courts of last instance; that compulsory referral should apply only to the latter category of courts or not at all; that in the context of a general system along the lines of that of the 1971 Protocol, the agreement of the parties should be required only in the case of courts of the common-law States and for a limited, 10-year period, hence with scope for review of the derogation with a view to possible alignment on the general system; that the agreement of the parties should be required in all Member States and limited to Supreme Courts, where neither of the parties was resident in a Contracting State of the Convention, etc.

A further solution was proposed for the problem under consideration, which was also designed to help solve the difficulty referred to in the preceding section; although it would not necessarily be an alternative to those indicated. This consisted in conferring on the Court of Justice the task of delivering opinions or non-binding decisions, rather than interpretative rulings which would be formally binding on the referring court. This solution could also perhaps involve strengthening the normal machinery for petitions for review in the interest of the law, with the Member States jointly appointing another body competent on the same footing as national bodies to lodge such appeals.

(b) Turning now to the second problem mentioned, when it came to considering practicalities (principally in the final stages of the negotiations), the most convincing solution was that which had been suggested and developed in relation to other Community Conventions in preparation which had raised or were raising similar difficulties. This was the idea of providing for two separate legal instruments: one to confer the jurisdiction in question on the Court of Justice, which, as noted earlier (see section 17), required ratification by all the Member States; the other, an instrument accepting that jurisdiction, admitting of a more limited number of ratifications.

27. However, the solutions proposed met with strong resistance, particularly from the delegations favouring the "traditional' system.

First and foremost, many Member States considered it contrary to the principles of their legal systems and to the actual authority of the judiciary to make judges' decisions formally conditional on the prior consent of the parties. Moreover, such a condition appeared to be at odds with the principle of cooperation between Member States' judiciaries and the Court of Justice, which underlay Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and the 1971 Protocol.

The proposal that courts of last resort should merely have the option of referral appeared less liable to "subvert' the system after the Cilfit judgement, which had given those courts greater scope to exercise their discretion [FN 18]. However, that judgement had also attenuated the urgent need, which lay behind the proposal, to allow those courts a wider margin of discretion.

The idea of establishing a separate system for the common-law States prompted the comment that this amounted to introducing, without clear objective grounds, a major exception to the general system, which would also have institutional repercussions. Moreover, such a derogation was at variance with the "universal' nature of the Rome Convention and liable to encourage the practice of "forum shopping'.

The idea that the Court of Justice should be reduced to a sort of consultative body was vigorously rejected not only by the Court of Justice and the Commission but also by most Member States. It was felt that this solution would in general be liable to weaken the role of the Court and was in practice ill-suited to achieving uniform interpretation of the Convention, given that any pronouncements by the Court of Justice would bear little weight in relation to the referring judge's decisions [FN 19].

28. In addition to these specific objections, there were also some important general points of concern.

These resulted primarily from a reluctance to amend the system laid down in the 1971 Protocol, which had proved its worth, had not given rise to any abuse and had by now become familiar to national courts. This reluctance was reinforced by the fear of creating a precedent which would pave the way for the proliferation of formulae other than the formulae laid down in the Protocol. Moreover, as has already been stated, both the Court of Justice and the Commission had openly endorsed these assessments.

To this was then added the consideration that all the solutions envisaged would have had the ultimate effect of substantially restricting the scope of the unifying activities of the Court of Justice and consequently the overall efficiency of the system. In fact, the courts of first instance were already excluded from the system. In addition, it was now being suggested that the highest courts should simply have the option of referring cases, and furthermore that such referral should be subject to the consensus of the parties. Under these circumstances, the cases of "authorized' evasion of the Court's jurisdiction would obviously increase considerably.

This would be all the more likely to happen if the two-Protocol system were used. In fact Member States who were parties to the Convention would then, if they ratified only the general Protocol, be entitled not to accept the Court's jurisdiction and therefore to prevent their own courts having any possibility of referral. This would also cause undesirable differentiation between Member States and encourage forum shopping.

29. For a long time the approval of several delegations hinged on the abovementioned objections. More or less wholehearted agreement was reached only at the last minute, thanks to a number of arguments put forward in support of the solution being proposed.

It was pointed out first of all that such a solution appeared to be the only practicable one in the circumstances and that the alternative would be simply not to establish the Court's jurisdiction.

Furthermore, unlike the 1968 Brussels Convention which established a system applicable only between the Member States, The Rome Convention is based, as has been pointed out many times, on universally applicable rules.

In addition, the purpose of the, so to speak, optional nature of one of the two Protocols was not to establish a permanent situation in advance, but merely to allow the system to get started, so as to encourage the later accession of such States as might have declined to joint it. After all, even for the Rome Convention, entry into force was subject to only seven ratifications.

Lastly, it was pointed out, in keeping with the conclusions shared by most of the interpretations of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and of the 1971 Protocol, that the rulings of the Court of Justice have a "persuasive effect' which transcends individual cases. The Court itself had stated that its interpretation of a Community Convention should be applied generally and uniformly [FN 20]. Practice has confirmed this trend, as shown by the attention generally given even by courts of first instance to the Court's interpretative rulings. In its turn the Rome Convention made a certain contribution to this trend, because Article 18 of that Convention is clearly also based on the Court's jurisprudence.

In other words, failure to ratify the first Protocol rules out the possibility of referral to the Court, but not the Court's interpretative jurisdiction and above all the general and indirect effects of exercising such jurisdiction, which tend to favour that uniform application of the Convention which the second Protocol itself states to be necessary. Therefore, in conclusion, serious problems of differentiation for certain Member States should not arise, provided, of course, that they have ratified the Rome convention.

E. Summary of solutions adopted

30. The reasons for the particular nature of the Protocols under examination cannot be grasped without having the terms of the discussions at hand in summary form. To avoid the difficulties mentioned and to achieve at least in part (and certainly as far as the principles are concerned) the desired result, it became necessary to work out comprise solutions, sometimes relating to key aspects of the problem.

The result is a system which presents a number of original features. Limiting ourselves to the main elements, and subject to further analytical examination, it may be summarized as follows:

(a) The jurisdiction of the Court is governed by two distinct Protocols, for the purposes and within the terms already mentioned. In the case of the Protocol establishing this jurisdiction, ratification by all the Member States is needed; in the other case, a minimum of seven ratifications is required, the same number as that necessary for the entry into force of the Rome Convention.

    The nature of the Court's jurisdiction is defined in the latter Protocol.

(b) Referral to the Court is optional not only for appeal Courts, but also for Courts of last instance, with the further important stipulations which we will deal with later. It is not open to judges of first instance.

    Courts of last instance are, here too, designated by name.

(c) The procedure governing petition for review in the interest of the law remains unchanged.

(d) Likewise, the system of exchange of information on the application of the Convention on the part of national courts is retained.

PART TWO

COMMENTARY

I. THE FIRST PROTOCOL

A. Introduction

31. This Protocol defines the scope of the Court's jurisdiction and the conditions under which that jurisdiction is exercised.

To this end, it reproduces in very general terms the arrangements for referrals for a preliminary ruling first set out in Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and subsequently in the Luxembourg Protocol of 1971, but it adds further important changes to the innovations already introduced into the original system by that 1971 Protocol.

This will be seen clearly from the following analysis; it should be noted that, for any aspect also applying to the 1971 Protocol, reference will in principle be made to the comments made on that Protocol and the later adjustments to it (see note 3).

B. Preamble

32. The preamble to the Protocol is substantially the same as the preambles to the Luxembourg Protocol of 1971: it refers to the Joint Declaration annexed to the Rome Convention, and expresses the decision to draw up the Protocol.

C. Scope of the Court's jurisdiction

33. Article 1 defines the scope of the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice in terms analogous to the precedents mentioned.

The following may therefore be the subject of interpretation by the Court: first of all, the Rome Convention, including the Protocol annexed thereto, which forms an integral part of it (Article 32 of the Convention); then the Conventions on the accession of the Member States to the Rome Convention [such as the Luxembourg Convention of 10 April 1984 concerning the accession of Greece: (see note 1)]; lastly, the Protocol actually under consideration (however, there is no mention of the second Protocol).

It should be emphasized here, however, that the references made in subsequent Articles to the abovementioned acts as a subject of interpretation by the Court of Justice are expressed in unusual detail compared with the precedents on the subject. In defining the questions of interpretation which may be put to the Court of Justice, the first sentence of Article 2 and paragraph 1 of Article 3 of the Protocol do not confine themselves, as do the precedents, to providing that such questions must concern the interpretation of the texts listed in Article 1, but refer to "the provisions contained in the instruments referred to in Article 1'.

This difference in wording relates to a question which is in fact not new and not confined to the Protocol under scrutiny; this question arose in the course of the negotiations with reference to a specific situation.

In certain Member States domestic law is, in fact, adapted to international Conventions through the issuing of appropriate laws wich reproduce the content of the Conventions, adapting them to the particular style of the national legislation if necessary. This, of course, raises a few problems from our point of view, since, for judges in the States in question, the reference will be dictated more often by the national law than the Convention, with the consequent risk of excluding the actual premises for action by the Court of Justice [FN 21].

In the case of the Protocol under examination the question arose in connection with the procedure followed by the Federal Republic of Germany for incorporating the Rome Convention into domestic law. The rules of the Convention were not absorbed in their organic entirety but were distributed, so to speak, among the introductory provisions of the Civil Code in accordance with the system applied to those provisions, and were also adjusted as regards their content.

The Commission of the European Communities was concerned about the repercussions of this approach, when it was still at the planning stage, and sent the Federal Republic an appropriate recommendation on 15 January 1985 (see note 7).

In the recommendation it stated that this approach could undermine full and integral compliance with the Rome Convention, prejudicing the uniformity of the interpretation and application of the Convention and even the exercise of the powers which were intended to be conferred on the Court of Justice. National judges would have to identify one by one the provisions derived from the Convention on which it might be necessary to seek an interpretative ruling from the Court.

The Commission's action did not change the Federal Republic's decisions. The law ratifying the Convention expressly excluded the direct effect of the rules of the Convention (Law of 25 July 1986, BGBl. 1986, II, 809); these rules were distributed among the introductory provisions mentioned above when these were simultaneously amended (BGBl. 1986, I, 1142) [FN 22].

During negotiations on the Protocol in question, however, it was the German delegation itself that suggested wording Articles 2 and 3 of the Protocol along the lines indicated above, omitting any direct reference to the Convention. As the german delegation subsequently explained in a statement in the minutes, the aim of this was precisely to overcome the problem already mentioned. The statement in fact says that by virtue of the wording proposed "if a question relates directly to the interpretation of a national rule which has transposed into national law a provision of one of the instruments referred to in Article 1 or corresponds to such a provision, the indirectly related question of interpretation of the rule on which the provision is based may be submitted to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling. The Rome Convention does not stipulate how the individual Contracting States have to transpose the provisions of the Convention into national law. This is a question which, according to international practice, it is left to the responsability of the States concerned to settle. Any Contracting State may therefore bring the Rome Convention into force either by directly giving it force of law or by adopting its provisions in appropriate form in its national legislation'. The statement also points out that Article 36 of the introductory provisions to the German Civil Code explicitly provides that those introductory provisions which concern contractual obligations based on the rules of the Convention must be interpreted and applied in a uniform manner.

The wording proposed by the German delegation was subsequently approved by the other Member States, leading eventually to the text as it now stands.

D. Conditions for referral and courts empowered to do so

34. Article 2 states the conditions under which a question of interpretation may be referred to the Court of Justice and lists the national courts which are allowed to make such referrals.

On both points the provisions restates nearly all the amendments to the system outlined in Article 177 of the EEC Treaty which were already made by the Luxembourg Protocol of 1971 (Articles 2 and 3). This applies in particular to the analytical list of courts of last instance, the inversion of the order of presentation between these and the others, and the exclusion - mentioned several times already- of the courts of first instance.

The Protocol differs from its immediate predecessor in other respects as well.

(a) The most substantial differences concern the conditions of referral to the Court of Justice.

The main difference, pointed out several times already, clearly lies in the fact that in this connection it does away with the usual distinction between national courts of last instance and the others, in the sense that even the former now merely have the option of making referrals, not an obligation to do so.

The reasons for this change and the concerns which underlie it have already been indicated (see section 26 et seq.) and so there is no need to return to them. Rather it may be noted that the fact that the aforementioned diversity of system has been removed means that the conditions of referral are now laid down in a single provision for all the relevant courts, rather than in two separate provisions, as is done both in Article 177 of the EEC Treaty (second and third paragraphs) and, in reverse order, in the 1971 Protocol [Article 3(1) and (2)].

Otherwise, the conditions in question are not substantively different from the usual ones: the question requiring interpretation must have arisen in a case pending before one of the courts mentioned; it must concern the interpretation of the legal instruments mentioned in Article 1 or rather-as stated in the previous paragraph-the "provisions contained' in those instruments; the court making the referral must consider that a preliminary ruling from the Court on the question put is necessary to enable it to give its own judgment.

On this last point it should be noted, in connection with the discussions held on this subject during the preparatory work (see sections 23, 26 et seq.), that in agreeing on the solution adopted in the Protocol, the representatives of the Member States said that they wanted to ensure that the courts empowered to apply to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling were allowed a discretionary power which they would exercise taking into consideration - subject to the national rules governing their operation - any appropriate factor, such as the position of the parties on the question of referral to the Court of Justice.

(b) As to the indication of the courts empowered to apply to the Court of Justice, Article 2 of the Protocol gives a specific list of courts of last instance.

To a large extent the list reproduces the list in Article 2 of the 1971 Protocol, as adjusted following the various accessions. Attention should also be drawn to the following differences:

- In the case of Italy, there has now been added a reference to the Consiglio di Stato, since it was considered that the provisions of the Rome Convention could also be invoked before the highest administrative court.

- For the United Kingdom, in addition to the House of Lords, reference is now made to "other courts from which no further appeal is possible', in such a way as to give the Protocol a broader field of application.

The fact that a distinction is no longer made between courts which are obliged to make a referral and those which simply have the option of doing so has not invalidated the listing of the courts of last instance. This is because this listing fulfils other requirements and, in particular, is intended to remove the doubts which had arisen with regard to the interpretation of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty in respect of the identification of those courts, and which had led to the changes introduced by the 1971 Protocol.

As regards appeal courts, it need only be pointed out that, as was already made clear in the report on this last Protocol, it is not the formal description which matters but the fact that the above courts act as appeal courts in this specific case.

It should also be pointed out with regard to the United Kingdom that, subject to a declaration to the contrary by that State, the courts empowered to hear appeals should exclude those which rule on appeals against decisions handed down by courts operating in European territories situated outside the United Kingdom, for the international relations of which that country is responsible [see Article 27 (2) (b) and (4) of the Rome Convention].

Finally, as previously stated, Article 2 of the Protocol makes no mention of courts of first instance, despite the strong criticism which this same omission had provoked in respect of the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol (see section 24), especially because of the potential risks which this might involve for the uniform interpretation of the Convention.

It was at least partly to meet this concern that the provision concerning "petition for review in the interest of the law', referred to in Article 3 of the Protocol in question and Article 4 of the 1971 Protocol, was introduced. It is in fact no accident that no provision has been made for such a procedure either in Article 177 of the EEC Treaty or in the 1971 Protocol, relating to the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies (see section 4), both of which permit the referral of cases by courts of first instance.

E. "Petition for review in the interest of the law' - Other rules applicable

35. Articles 3 and 4 of the Protocol concern respectively "petition for review in the interest of the law' and the applicability of the rules of the EEC Treaty and the Court of Justice Protocol, as well as possible adjustments to the Rules of Procedure.

Both the provisions reiterate word-for-word the corresponding provisions of the 1971 Protocol (Articles 4 and 5) and there is therefore no need to comment at length.

With regard to petition for review in the interest of the law, suffice it to point out that despite what has just been said about its specific aims (see previous section), it has never yet been applied in practice. It should also be remembered that the Protocol under scrutiny does not merely rule out reference to the Court for courts of first instance; it also makes such referral optional for courts of last instance. And that could increase the likelihood of petition for review in the interest or the law.

As for Article 4 of the Protocol, it should be considered that it also includes the applicability, for the proceedings instituted by virtue of the Protocol itself, of Article 20 of the Court's Statute. This means, among other things, that even the Member States that have not ratified the Protocol can submit statements of case or written observations during these proceedings.

F. Ratification and entry into force of the Protocol

36. Articles 5 and 6 are concerned respectively with the ratification and entry into force of the Protocol. The first corresponds exactly to Article 7 of the 1971 Protocol and does not require further comment.

Article 6, however, represents a considerable innovation with respect to Article 8 of that Protocol, for the reasons mentioned several times. The entry into force of the Protocol in hand is now linked not to ratification by all the Member States, but by seven of those States in respect of which the Rome Convention is in force (the Convention itself, of course, requiring the same minimum number of ratifications).

This enables the entry into force of the Protocol to be linked to that of the Convention (and successive ratifications must apply to both), while also permitting circumvention of the requirement for unanimity, which raises grave difficulties in this case, as has been noted, although other difficulties might be created by the solution adopted (see sections 25 and 28).

In fact, at the signing of the Protocols, the Irish delegation made the following statement:

> 'At the time of signature of the First Protocol on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the European Communities of the Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations, opened for signature in Rome on 19 June 1980, the Irish delegation states that because of certain provisions of the Constitution of Ireland concerning the jurisdiction of, and the administration of justice by, the Courts of Ireland, Ireland is not at present in a position to ratify this Protocol, adherence to which is not an obligation of the Treaties establishing the European Communities, and will not be in a position to proceed to ratification until such time as the constitutional impediment has been removed.'

Of course, in view of the fact that this Protocol cannot become effective if the Court's jurisdiction has not been established by unanimous agreement among the Member States, its entry into force is conditional on that of the second Protocol.

G. Other standard clauses - Duration of the Protocol

37. Articles 7 to 11 contain standard clauses, or clauses which in any event already exist in almost identical terms in the 1971 Luxembourg Protocol.

Article 9, however, differs from the corresponding provision in that Protocol. Whereas the latter was concluded for an unlimited period like the Brussels Convention to which it refers (Article 12), this Protocol follows the model of the Rome Convention, which was concluded for ten years with tacit renewal every five years if there has been no denunciation (Article 30 of the Convention).

H. The question of territorial scope

38. It should be noted that, like the second Protocol, this Protocol contains no clause on the field of its territorial scope, whereas the Rome Convention does include a special provision on the subject (Article 27).

The absence of any such provision from the two Protocols is in fact in line with more recent practice in Community conventions and those associated with them. Indeed, the Convention of Accession of Spain and Portugal to the 1968 Brussels Convention not only contains no clause on territorial application, but also deletes those contained in the Brussels Convention itself (Article 60) and in the 1971 Protocol (Article 6) (see respectively Article 21 and Articles 26 and 27 of the Donostia-San Sebastian Convention). A similar omission is to be found in the 1988 Lugano Convention (see note 3).

In considering the implications of this lack of any definition of the scope of the Protocols, it is sufficient to refer to the reports on the aforementioned Conventions of Donostia-San Sebastian and Lugano, given their similarity.

The fact that the Rome Convention contains a territorial clause should not have any repercussion for the two Protocols in hand, in terms of authorizing any extension of the scope of the Convention to the Protocols. In fact, although closely linked, these contractual instruments are formally independent. In any event, in cases where it was desired that the territorial scope of a Protocol should coincide with that of the "main' Convention, appropriate clauses were inserted into both texts (as indeed occured with the Brussels Convention and the Protocol relating to it, before the aforementioned deletion).

I. Accession of new members

39. The Protocol also omits any provision on the accession of any new members of the EEC, whereas Article 9 of the 1971 Protocol requires them to accede. This is because the Rome Convention is not based on Article 220 of the EEC Treaty and so, unlike the Brussels Convention, it necessarily left open the matter of the accession of future Community members. However, the Protocol resembles the Rome Convention in having a "Joint Declaration' annexed to it, in which the signatory countries state their conviction that "any State which becomes a member of the European Communities should accede to this Protocol'.

It should be noted that the Protocol was also signed by Spain and Portugal, which are not yet parties to the Rome Convention.

J. Exchange of information

40. Lastly, it is worth pointing out that this Protocol, like the 1971 Protocol, has annexed to it a "Joint Declaration' in which Member States declare themselves ready to organize an exchange of information on judgements which have become res judicata and have been handed down pursuant to the Rome Convention by the courts referred to in Article 2 of this Protocol.

However, in relation to the corresponding Declaration annexed to the Luxembourg Protocol, the Declaration currently being considered gives a far more analytical description of the information concerned. It is likely that this was achieved to some extent thanks to the specific precedent provided by Article 2(1) of Protocol 2 annexed to the abovementioned 1988 Lugano Convention.

II. THE SECOND PROTOCOL

41. The examination of this Protocol requires little comment.

The preamble describes the reasons why the instrument was drawn up. It refers to the fact that the Rome Convention enters into force after the seventh ratification and stresses that, even before its entry into force, in order to ensure uniform application of the Convention, a mechanism needs to be introduced in order to ensure its uniform interpretation, and that this could be achieved by conferring the appropriate powers on the Court of Justice.

Article 1 therefore confers those powers according to the terms and conditions laid down in the first Protocol. The reference to the application of the Protocol on the Statute of the Court of Justice and of the Rules of Procedure, and to any necessary adaptation of the latter, is restated here, although already included in the First Protocol, in order to base the provision on the unanimous agreement of the Member States.

With regard to Articles 2 to 4, it only needs to be stressed that, for the reasons given on a number of occasions, the Protocol can enter into force only after ratification by all the Member States (Article 3).

1- As is known, the Rome Convention was concluded on 19 June 1980. On that occasion it was signed by seven States at that time Members of the Community. Denmark signed on 10 March 1981 and the United Kingdom on 7 december of the same year. (The text of the Convention can be found in OJ No L 266, 9. 10. 1980. The report on the Convention by Professors Giuliano and Lagarde was published in OJ No C 282, 31. 10. 1980). Seven ratifications are required for the Convention to enter into force. So far, six countries have ratified it, in order of date: France, Italy, Denmark, Luxembourg, Federal Republic of Germany and Belgium.
After Greece's entry into the Community, the Convention for the accession of that State to the Rome Convention (OJ No L 146, 31. 5. 1984) was signed in Luxembourg on 10 April 1984. Its entry into force is dependent on it being ratified by Greece and at least seven other signatory States. So far, the following have deposited the instruments of ratification, in order of date: France, Italy, Denmark, Luxembourg, Greece, Federal Republic of Germany.
Spain and Portugal are required by Article 3(2) of the Act of Accession of those States to the Community to accede, with whatever adjustments may be necessary, to the "Community' Conventions (see OJ No L 302, 15. 11. 1985, also below, note 6). Up to now, however, negotiations for accession to the Rome Convention have not yet begun.
On the subject of that Convention see in particular - already shortly after it was signed - T. Treves (ed.), Verso una disciplina comunitaria della xlegge applicabile ai contratti, Cedam, Padua, 1983; and more recently, with ample bibliography, M. Virgos Soriano, El Convenio de Roma de 19 de junio 1980 sobre la ley aplicable a las obligaciones contractuales, in E. García de Enterria, J. D. González Campos and S. Muñoz Machado,Tratado de Derecho Comunitario Europeo, Civitas, Madrid, 1986, vol. III, pp. 753 et seq.

Specifically on the Protocols covered by this report, see M. Virgos Soriano, Les problèmes internationaux de la faillite et le Marché Commun, Cedam, Padua, 1971, which covers the proceedings of a conference held in Milan on 12 to 15 June 1970. For the aspect which is of interest here, see, in the same volume, A. Tizzano, La déclaration commune et la compétence de la Cour de Justice des Communautés européennes, pp. 170 et seq.

3- The texts of the Brussels Convention of 1968 and the Luxembourg Conventions of 1978 and 1982 all in force can be found respectively in OJ No L 299, 31. 12. 1972; OJ No L 304, 30. 10. 1978 and OJ No L 388, 31. 12. 1982.
The Donostia-San Sebastian Convention was published in OJ No L 285, 3. 10. 1989. It will enter into force after ratification by two States, of which one must be the Kingdom of Spain or the Portuguese Republic.
A consolidated text has been published in OJ No C 189, 28. 7. 1990.
The reports on the above Conventions were drawn up by, in order of date: Mr Jenard (OJ No C 59, 5. 3. 1979), Mr Schlosser (ibid), Messrs Evrigenis and Kerameus (OJ No C 298, 24. 11. 1986); Messrs Almeida Cruz, Desantes Real and Jenard (OJ No C 189, 28. 7. 1990).
To complete the picture, it should be pointed out that a Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgements in civil and commercial matters (OJ No L 319, 25. 11. 1988, p. 9) was opened for signature by the Member States of the European Communities and EFTA in Lugano on 16 September 1988. This so-to-speak parallel Convention to the Brussels Convention of 1968 has been signed by seven Member States of the European Communities (Belgium, Denmark, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands and Portugal) and five Member States of EFTA (Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland). It will enter into force after the deposit of the instruments of ratification of two signatory States, one a member of the European Communities and the other of EFTA. The report on the Convention was drawn up by Messrs Jenard and Möller (OJ No C 189, 28. 7. 1990).

4- See OJ No L 204, 2. 8. 1975. The Protocol entered into force on 1 September 1975 for the original six Member States of the European Communities. For the others, accession to the Protocol proceeded pari passu with accession to the Brussels Convention (see previous note). Similarly, the reports on the Protocol are incorporated in those on the Brussels Convention and on the other Conventions which have amended it (ibid).
The Protocol relating to the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies, on the other hand, suffered the same fate as that Convention which, as has been noted, never gained the required number of ratifications.

5- The hypothesis now under consideration by the Member States, given the difficulties still existing in this matter, involves adopting the Convention in preparation within the Council of Europe "on certain international aspects of insolvency' and subsequently carrying out further harmonization within the Community framework.
For the text of the 1980 draft see Bulletin of the European Communities, Supplement 2/82, which also contains the report of the Chairman of the Working Party, Mr Lemontey (ibid). For a more recent analysis, see also L. Daniele, Il fallimento nel diritto internazionale privato e processuale, Cedam, Padua, 1987, pp. 22 et seq.

6- See OJ No L 401, 31. 12. 1989. For the first of the abovementioned conferences see the volume published by the Council of the European Communities: Texts established by the Luxembourg Conference on the Community Patent 1985, Luxembourg, 1985.

7- In particular: with the opinion of 17 March 1980 regarding the draft Convention (OJ No L 94, 11. 4. 1980, p. 39), to which we shall return later (but see especially note 12) and the recommendation of 15 January 1985 regarding the Convention (OJ No L 44, 14. 2. 1985, p. 42) (on which see section 33).

8- These are the terms defining, in its own preamble, the Convention on the Community patent of 15 December 1975 (see note 5). But these are also the terms defining, in Article 3(2) of the Act of accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Communities, the conventions to which, in addition to the conventions based on Article 220, those two States undertake to accede.

9- The reference is of course to Article 18, according to which "In the interpretation and application of the preceding uniform rules, regard shall be had to their international character and to the desirability of achieving uniformity in their interpretation and application'. 15- Thus, inter alia, the Commission in the opinion of 17 March 1980 cited above (note 7), and, with abundant examples, M. Virgos Soriano, La interpretación ..., pp. 89 et seq.
Note also that the Court of Justice had, albeit indirectly, already had occasion to interpret the Rome Convention; see the Judgements of 26 May 1982, Case 133/81, Ivenel/Schwab, Court Reports 1982, p. 1900; and 8 March 1988, Case 9/87, Arcado/Haviland, Court Reports 1988, p. 1555. 18- See the Judgments of 6 October 1982, Case 283/81,Court Reports 1982, pp. 3415 et seq. and pp. 3429 et seq.
In this judgement, of course, the Court began by confirming that, in the framework of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty, even courts of last instance may use their discretion to decide whether an interpretative pronouncement from the Court of Justice is necessary for deciding the case pending before them. But above all, it stated that such courts may, albeit with all due circumspection, refrain from referral where the Community law to be applied has such a clear meaning as not to raise any doubt in reality as to its interpretation.

19- See again the opinion of 17 March 1980 cited above [FN 7], and R. Luzzatto [FN10], pp. 65 et seq.

20- See especially the Judgment of 14 July 1977, joined Cases 9 and 10/77, Bavaria Fluggesellschaft and Germanair/Eurocontrol, Court Reports 1977, p. 1517, in which the Court states that "The principle of legal certainty in the Community legal system and the objectives of the Brussels Convention (of 1968) in accordance with Article 220 of the EEC Treaty, which is at its origin, require in all Member States a uniform application of the legal concepts and legal classifications developed by the Court in the context of the Brussels Convention.'

PREÁMBULO

LAS ALTAS PARTES CONTRATANTES DEL TRATADO CONSTITUTIVO DE LA COMUNIDAD ECONÓMICA EUROPEA,

PREOCUPADAS por proseguir, en el ámbito del Derecho internacional privado, la obra de unificación jurídica ya emprendida en la Comunidad, especialmente en materia de competencia judicial y de ejecución de resoluciones judiciales,

DESEANDO establecer unas normas uniformes relativas a la ley aplicable a las obligaciones contractuales,

HAN CONVENIDO LAS DISPOSICIONES SIGUIENTES:

TÍTULO I ÁMBITO DE APLICACIÓN

Artículo 1

Ámbito de aplicación

1. Las disposiciones del presente Convenio serán aplicables, en las situaciones que impliquen un conflicto de leyes, a las obligaciones contractuales.

2. N° se aplicarán:

a) al estado civil y a la capacidad de las personas físicas, sin perjuicio de lo dispuesto en el artículo 11;

b) a las obligaciones contractuales relativas a:

- los testamentos y sucesiones;

- los regímenes matrimoniales;

- los derechos y deberes derivados de relaciones de familia, de parentesco, de matrimonio o de afinidad, incluidas las obligaciones de dar alimentos respecto a los hijos no matrimoniales;

c) a las obligaciones derivadas de letras de cambio, cheques y pagarés, así como de otros instrumentos negociables en la medida en que las obligaciones surgidas de estos otros instrumentos se deriven de su carácter negociable;

d) a los convenios de arbitraje y de elección de foro;

e) a las cuestiones pertenecientes al Derecho de sociedades, asociaciones y personas jurídicas, tales como la constitución, la capacidad jurídica, el funcionamiento interno y la disolución de las sociedades, asociaciones y personas jurídicas, así como la responsabilidad personal legal de los socios y de los órganos por las deudas de la sociedad, asociación o persona jurídica;

f) a la cuestión de saber si un intermediario puede obligar frente a terceros a la persona por cuya cuenta pretende actuar, o si un órgano de una sociedad, de una asociación o una persona jurídica puede obligar frente a terceros a esta sociedad, asociación o persona jurídica;

g) a la constitución de trusts, a las relaciones que se creen entre quienes lo constituyen, los trusts y los beneficiarios;

h) a la prueba y al processo, sin perjuicio del artículo 14.

3. Las disposiciones del presente Convenio no se aplicarán a los contratos de seguros que cubran riesgos situados en los territorios de los Estados miembros de la Comunidad Económica Europea. Para determinar si un riesgo está situado en estos territorios, el juez aplicará su ley interna.

4. El apartado precedente no se refiere a los contratos de reaseguro.

Artículo 2

Carácter universal

La ley designada por el presente Convenio se aplicará incluso si tal ley es la de un Estado no contratante.

TÍTULO II NORMAS UNIFORMES

Artículo 3

Libertad de elección

1. Los contratos se regirán por la ley elegida por las partes. Esta elección deberá ser expresa o resultar de manera cierta de los términos del contrato o de las circunstancias del caso. Para esta elección, las partes podrán designar la ley aplicable a la totalidad o solamente a una parte del contrato.

2. Las partes podrán, en cualquier momento, convenir que se rija el contrato por una ley distinta de la que lo regía con anterioridad bien sea en virtud de una elección anterior según el presente artículo, o bien en virtud de otras disposiciones del presente Convenio. Toda modificación relativa a la determinación de la ley aplicable, posterior a la celebración del contrato, no obstará a la validez formal del contrato a efectos del artículo 9 y no afectará a los derechos de terceros.

3. La elección por las partes de una ley extranjera, acompañada o no de la de un tribunal extranjero, no podrá afectar, cuando todos los demás elementos de la situación estén localizados en el momento de esta elección en un solo país, a las disposiciones que la ley de ese país no permita derogar por contrato, denominadas en lo sucesivo «disposiciones imperativas».

4. La existencia y la validez del consentimiento de las Partes en cuanto a la elección de la ley aplicable se regirán por las disposiciones establecidas en los artículos 8, 9 y 11.

Ley aplicable a falta de elección

1. En la medida en que la ley aplicable al contrato no hubiera sido elegida conforme a las disposiciones del artículo 3, el contrato se regirá por la ley del país con el que presente los vínculos más estrechos. N° obstante, si una parte del contrato fuera separable del resto del contrato y presenta una vinculación más estrecha con otro país, podrá aplicarse, con carácter excepcional, a esta parte del contrato la ley de este otro país.

2. Sin perjuicio del apartado 5, se presumirá que el contrato presenta los vínculos más estrechos con el país en que la parte que deba realizar la prestación característica tenga, en el momento de la celebración del contrato, su residencia habitual o, si se tratare de una sociedad, asociación o persona jurídica, su administración central. N° obstante, si el contrato se celebrare en el ejercicio de la actividad profesional de esta parte, este país será aquél en que esté situado su establecimiento principal o si, según el contrato, la prestación tuviera que ser realizada por un establecimiento distinto del establecimiento principal, aquél en que esté situado este otro establecimiento.

3. N° obstante lo dispuesto en el apartado 2, en la medida en que el contrato tenga por objeto un derecho real inmobiliario o un derecho de utilización de un inmueble, se presumirá que el contrato presenta los vínculos más estrechos con el país en que estuviera situado el inmueble.

4. El contrato de transporte de mercancías no estará sometido a la presunción del apartado 2. En este contrato, si el país en el que el transportista tiene su establecimiento principal en el momento de la celebración del contrato fuere también aquél en que esté situado el lugar de carga o de descarga o el establecimiento principal del expedidor, se presumirá que el contrato tiene sus vínculos más estrechos con este país. Para la aplicación del presente apartado, se considerarán como contratos de transporte de mercancías los contratos de fletamento para un solo viaje u otros contratos cuyo objeto principal sea el de realizar un transporte de mercancías.

5. N° se aplicará el apartado 2 cuando no pueda determinarse la prestación característica. Las presunciones de los apartados 2, 3 y 4 quedan excluidas cuando resulte del conjunto de circunstancias que el contrato presenta vínculos más estrechos con otro país.

Artículo 5

Contratos celebrados por los consumidores

1. El presente artículo se aplicará a los contratos que tengan por objeto el suministro de bienes muebles corporales o de servicios a una persona, el consumidor, para un uso que pueda ser considerado como ajeno a su actividad profesional, así como a los contratos destinados a la financiación de tales suministros.

2. Sin perjuicio de lo dispuesto en el artículo 3, la elección por las partes de la ley aplicable no podrá producir el resultado de privar al consumidor de la protección que le aseguren las disposiciones imperativas de la ley del país en que tenga su residencia habitual:

- si la celebración del contrato hubiera sido precedida, en ese país, por una oferta que le haya sido especialmente dirigida o por publicidad, y si el consumidor hubiera realizado en ese país los actos necesarios para la celebración del contrato, o

- si la otra parte contratante o su representante hubiera el encargo del consumidor en ese país, o

- si el contrato fuera una venta de mercancías y el consumidor se hubiera desplazado de este país a un país extranjero y allí hubiera realizado el encargo, siempre que el viaje hubiera sido organizado por el vendedor con la finalidad de incitar al consumidor a concluir una venta.

3. N° obstante lo dispuesto en el artículo 4, y en defecto de elección realizada conforme al artículo 3, estos contratos se regirán por la ley del país en que el consumidor su residencia habitual, si concurrieran las circunstancias descritas en el apartado 2 del presente artículo.

4. El presente artículo no se aplicará:

a) a los contratos de transporte;

b) a los contratos de suministro de servicios cuando los servicios deban prestarse al consumidor, exclusivamente, en un país distinto de aquél en que tenga su residencia habitual.

5. N° obstante lo dispuesto en el apartado 4, el presente artículo se aplicará a los contratos que, por un precio global, comprendan prestaciones combinadas de transporte y alojamiento.

Artículo 6

Contracto individual de trabajo

1. N° obstante lo dispuesto en el artículo 3, en el contrato de trabajo, la elección por las partes de la ley aplicable no podrá tener por resultado el privar al trabajador de la protección que le proporcionen las disposiciones imperativas de la ley que sería aplicable, a falta de elección, en virtud del apartado 2 del presente artículo.

2. N° obstante lo dispuesto en el artículo 4 y a falta de elección realizada de conformidad con el artículo 3, el contrato de trabajo se regirá:

a) por la ley del país en que el trabajador, en ejecución del contrato, realice habitualmente su trabajo, aun cuando, con carácter temporal, haya sido enviado a otro país, o

b) si el trabajador no realiza habitualmente su trabajo en un mismo país, por la ley del país en que se encuentre el establecimiento que haya contratado al trabajador, a menos que, del conjunto de circunstancias, resulte que el contrato de trabajo tenga vínculos más estrechos con otro país, en cuyo caso será aplicable la ley de este otro país.

Leyes de policía

1. Al aplicar, en virtud del presente Convenio, la ley de un país determinado, podrá darse efecto a las disposiciones imperativas de la ley de otro país con el que la situación presente un vínculo estrecho, si y en la medida en que, tales disposiciones, según el derecho de este último país, son aplicables cualquiera que sea la ley que rija el contrato. Para decidir si se debe dar efecto a estas disposiciones imperativas, se tendrá en cuenta su naturaleza y su objeto, así como las consecuencias que se derivarían de su aplicación o de su inaplicación.

2. Las disposiciones del presente Convenio no podrán afectar a la aplicación de las normas de la ley del país del juez que rijan imperativamente la situación, cualquiera que sea la ley aplicable al contrato.

Consentimiento y validez de fondo

1. La existencia y la validez del contrato, o de cualquiera de sus disposiciones, estarán sometidas a la ley que sería aplicable en virtud del presente Convenio si el contrato o la disposición fueran válidos.

2. Sin embargo, para establecer que no ha dado su consentimiento, cualquiera de las partes podrá referirse a la ley del país en que tenga su residencia habitual si de las circunstancias resulta que no sería razonable determinar el efecto del comportamiento de tal parte según la ley prevista en el apartado precedente.

Forma

1. Un contrato celebrado entre personas que se encuentren en un mismo país será válido en cuanto a la forma si reúne las condiciones de forma de la ley que lo rija en cuanto al fondo en virtud del presente Convenio o de la ley del país en el que se haya celebrado.

2. Un contrato celebrado entre personas que se encuentren en países diferentes será válido en cuanto a la forma si reúne las condiciones de forma de la ley que lo rija en cuanto al fondo en virtud del presente Convenio o de la ley de uno de estos países.

3. Cuando se celebre el contrato por medio de un representante, el país en el que se encuentre el representante en el momento de actuar será el que se considere para la aplicación de los apartados 1 y 2.

4. Un acto jurídico unilateral relativo a un contrato celebrado o por celebrar será válido en cuanto a la forma si reúne las condiciones de forma de la ley que rija o regirá el fondo del contrato en virtud del presente Convenio o de la ley del país en el que se efectúe dicho acto.

5. Las disposiciones de los apartados precedentes no se aplicarán a los contratos que entren en el ámbito de aplicación del artículo 5 celebrados en las circunstancias descritas en su apartado 2. La forma de estos contratos se regirá por la ley del país en el que tenga su residencia habitual el consumidor.

6. N° obstante lo dispuesto en los cuatro primeros apartados del presente artículo, todo contrato que tenga por objeto un derecho real inmobiliario o un derecho de utilización de un inmueble estará sometido, en cuanto a la forma, a las normas imperativas de la ley del país en que el inmueble esté sito, siempre que según esta ley sean aplicables independientemente del lugar de celebración del contrato y de la ley que lo rija en cuanto al fondo.

Ámbito de la ley del contrato

1. La ley aplicable al contrato en virtud de los artículos 3 a 6 y del artículo 12 del presente Convenio regirá en particular:

a) su interpretación;

b) el cumplimiento de las obligaciones que genere;

c) dentro de los límites de los poderes atribuidos al tribunal por sus leyes procesales, las consecuencias del incumplimiento total o parcial de estas obligaciones, incluida la evaluación del daño en la medida en que la gobiernen normas jurídicas;

d) los diversos modos de extinción de las obligaciones, así como la prescripción y la caducidad basadas en la expiración de un plazo;

e) las consecuencias de la nulidad del contrato.

2. En lo que se refiere a las modalidades del cumplimiento y a las medidas que debe tomar al acreedor en caso de cumplimiento defectuoso, se tendrá en cuenta la ley del país donde tenga lugar el cumplimiento.

Artículo 11

Incapacidad

En los contratos celebrados entre personas que se encuentren en un mismo país, las personas físicas que gocen de capacidad de conformidad con la ley de ese país sólo podrán invocar su incapacidad resultante de otra ley si, en el momento de la celebración del contrato, la otra parte hubiera conocido tal incapacidad o la hubiera ignorado en virtud de imprudencia por su parte.

Artículo 12

Cesión de crédito

1. Las obligaciones entre el cedente y el cesionario de un crédito se regirán por la ley que, en virtud del presente Convenio, se aplique al contrato que les ligue.

2. La ley que rija el crédito cedido determinará el carácter transferible del mismo, las relaciones entre el cesionario y el deudor, las condiciones de oponibilidad de la cesión al deudor y el carácter liberatorio de la prestación hecha por el deudor.

Subrogación

1. Cuando, en virtud de un contrato, una persona, el acreedor, tenga derechos con respecto a otra persona, el deudor, y un tercero tenga la obligación de satisfacer al acreedor o haya satisfecho, de hecho, al acreedor en ejecución de esa obligación, la ley aplicable a esta obligación del tercero determinará si éste puede ejercer en su totalidad o en parte los derechos que el acreedor tenía contra el deudor según la ley que rija sus relaciones.

2. La misma regla se aplicará cuando varias personas estén obligadas por la misma obligación contractual y el acreedor haya sido satisfecho por una de ellas.

Prueba

1. La ley que rija el contrato en virtud del presente Convenio se aplicará en la medida en que, en materia de obligaciones contractuales, establezca presunciones legales o reparta la carga de la prueba.

2. Los actos jurídicos podrán ser acreditados por cualquier medio de prueba admitido bien por la ley

2. Los actos jurídicos podrán ser acreditados por cualquier medio de prueba admitido bien por la ley del foro, o bien por cualquiera de las leyes contempladas en el artículo 9, conforme a la cual el acto sea válido en cuanto a la forma, siempre que tal medio de prueba pueda ser empleado ante el tribunal que esté en conocimiento del asunto.

Exclusión del reenvío

Cuando el presente Convenio prescriba la aplicación de la ley de un país, se entenderá por tal las normas jurídicas en vigor en ese país, con exclusión de las normas de Derecho internacional privado.

Artículo 16

Orden público

N° podrá excluirse la aplicación de una disposición de la ley designada por el presente Convenio salvo cuando sea manifiestamente incompatible con el orden público del foro.

Artículo 17

Aplicación en el tiempo

El Convenio se aplicará en cada Estado contratante a los contratos celebrados después de su entrada en vigor en tal Estado.

Artículo 18

Interpretación uniforme

Para la interpretación y la aplicación de las reglas uniformes que preceden, se tendrán en cuenta su carácter internacional y la conveniencia de conseguir que se interpreten y apliquen de manera uniforme.

Artículo 19

Sistemas no unificados

1. Cuando un Estado comprenda varias unidades territoriales y cada una de ellas tenga sus propias normas en materia de obligaciones contractuales, cada unidad territorial se considerará como un país para la determinación de la ley aplicable según el presente Convenio.

2. Un Estado cuyas diferentes unidades territoriales tengan sus propias normas jurídicas en materia de obligaciones contractuales no estará obligado a aplicar el presente Convenio a los conflictos de leyes que interesen únicamente a esas unidades territoriales.

Prioridad del Derecho comunitario

El presente Convenio se entiende sin perjuicio de la aplicación de las disposiciones que, en materias específicas, regulen los conflictos de leyes en materia de obligaciones contractuales y que estén o estarán contenidas en los actos derivados de las instituciones de las Comunidades Europeas o en las legislaciones nacionales armonizadas en ejecución de estos actos.

Artículo 21

Relaciones con otros convenios

a) el apartado 1 del artículo 7;

b) la letra e) del apartado 1 del artículo 10.

2. Cualquier Estado contratante podrá hacer igualmente, notificando una ampliación del Convenio de conformidad con el apartado 2 del artículo 27, una o varias de estas reservas con efecto limitado a los territorios o a ciertos territorios mencionados en la ampliación.

3. Cualquier Estado contratante podrá retirar, en cualquier momento, una reserva que hubiera efectuado; el efecto de la reserva cesará el primer día del tercer mes natural siguiente a la notificación de la retirada.

TÍTULO III CLÁUSULAS FINALES

Artículo 23

1. Si un Estado contratante, después de la fecha de entrada en vigor del presente Convenio con respecto a él, desease adoptar una nueva norma de conflicto de leyes para una categoría específica de contratos que entren en el ámbito de aplicación del convenio, comunicará su intención a los demás Estados signatarios por medio del secretario general del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas.

2. En un plazo de seis meses a partir de la comunicación hecha al secretario general, cualquier Estado signatario podrá solicitar a éste que organice unas consultas entre Estados signatarios con el fin de llegar a un acuerdo.

3. Si, en este plazo, ningún Estado signatario hubiera solicitado la consulta, o si, en los dos años siguientes a la comunicación hecha al secretario general, no se hubiere llegado a ningún acuerdo como consecuencia de las consultas, el Estado contratante podrá modificar su derecho. La medida tomada por este Estado se pondrá en conocimiento de los demás Estados signatarios por mediación del secretario general del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas.

1. Si un Estado contratante, después de la fecha de entrada en vigor del presente Convenio con respecto a él, deseare formar parte de un convenio multilateral cuyo objeto principal, o uno de los objetos principales, fuera una regulación de Derecho internacional privado en una de las materias regidas por el presente Convenio, se aplicará el procedimento previsto en el artículo 23. N° obstante, el plazo de dos años, previsto en el apartado 3 del artículo 23, se reducirá a un año.

2. N° se seguirá el procedimiento previsto en el apartado precedente si un Estado contratante o una de las Comunidades Europeas ya fueran parte del convenio multilateral o si el objeto de éste fuera revisar un convenio del que fuera ya parte el Estado interesado o si se tratase de un convenio celebrado en el marco de los Tratados constitutivos de las Comunidades Europeas.

Cuando un Estado contratante considere que la unificación realizada por el presente Convenio se ve comprometida por la celebración de acuerdos no previstos en el apartado 1 del artículo 24, este Estado podrá solicitar al secretario general del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas que organice una consulta entre los Estados signatarios del presente Convenio.

Artículo 26

Cualquier Estado contratante podrá solicitar la revisión del presente Convenio. En tal caso, el presidente del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas convocará una conferencia de revisión.

Artículo 27

1. El presente Convenio se aplicará en el territorio europeo de los Estados contratantes, comprendida Groenlandia, y en la totalidad del territorio de la República Francesa.

2. N° obstante lo dispuesto en el apartado 1:

a) el presente Convenio no se aplicará a las islas Feroe, salvo declaración en contrario del Reino de Dinamarca;

b) el presente Convenio no se aplicará a los territorios europeos situados fuera del Reino Unido y cuyas relaciones internacionales hubiera asumido éste, salvo declaración en contrario del Reino Unido para tal territorio;

c) el presente Convenio se aplicará a las Antillas neerlandesas, si el Reino de los Países Bajos hiciese una declaración en ese sentido.

3. Estas declaraciones podrán efectuarse en cualquier momento, mediante notificación al secretario general del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas.

4. Los procesos de apelación interpuestos en el Reino Unido contra resoluciones de los tribunales situados en uno de los territorios mencionados en la letra b) del apartado 2 serán considerados como procesos que se desarrollan ante estos tribunales.

1. El presente Convenio estará abierto a partir del 19 de junio de 1980 a la firma de los Estados partes del Tratado constitutivo de la Comunidad Económica Europea.

2. El presente Convenio será ratificado, aceptado o aprobado por los Estados signatarios. Los instrumentos de ratificación, de aceptación o de aprobación se depositarán ante la Secretaría General del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas.

Artículo 29

1. El presente Convenio entrará en vigor el primer día del tercer mes siguiente al depósito del séptimo instrumento de ratificación, de aceptación o de aprobación.

2. El Convenio entrará en vigor, para cada Estado signatario que lo ratifique, acepte o apruebe con posterioridad, el primer día del tercer mes siguiente al depósito de su instrumento de ratificación, de aceptación o de aprobación.

Artículo 30

1. El Convenio tendrá una vigencia de diez años a partir de la fecha de su entrada en vigor conforme al apartado 1 del artículo 29, incluso para los Estados para los que entrase en vigor con posterioridad.

2. El Convenio será renovado tácitamente por períodos de cinco años, salvo denuncia.

3. La denuncia será notificada, al menos seis meses antes de la expiración del plazo de diez años o de cinco años, según los casos, al secretario general del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas. Podrá limitarse esta denuncia a uno de los territorios a los que se hubiera extendido el Convenio en aplicación del apartado 2 del artículo 27.

4. La denuncia sólo tendrá efectos para el Estado que la hubiere notificado. El Convenio permanecerá vigente para los demás Estados contratantes.

Artículo 31

El secretario general del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas notificará a los Estados partes del Tratado constitutivo de la Comunidad Económica Europea:

a) las firmas;

b) el depósito de cualquier instrumento de ratificación, aceptación o aprobación;

c) la fecha de entrada en vigor del presente Convenio;

d) las comunicaciones realizadas en aplicación de los artículos 23, 24, 25, 26, 27 y 30;

e) las reservas y retiradas de reservas mencionadas en el artículo 22.

Artículo 32

El Protocolo anexo al presente Convenio forma parte integrante del mismo.

Artículo 33

El presente Convenio, redactado en un ejemplar único en lenguas alemana, danesa, francesa, inglesa, irlandesa, italiana y neerlandesa, dando fe por igual todos los textos, se depositará en los archivos de la Secretaría General del Consejo de las Comunidades Europeas. Artigo 2o.

Carácter universal

A lei designada nos termos da presente convenção é aplicável, mesmo que essa lei seja de um Estado não contratante.

TÍTULO II REGRAS UNIFORMES

Artigo 3o.

Liberdade de escolha

1. O contrato rege-se pela lei escolhida pelas partes. Esta escolha deve ser expressa ou resultar de modo inequívoco das disposições do contrato ou das circunstâncias da causa. Mediante esta escolha, as partes podem designar a lei aplicável à totalidade ou apenas a uma parte do contrato.

2. Em qualquer momento, as partes podem acordar em sujeitar o contrato a uma lei diferente da que antecedentemente o regulava, quer por força de uma escolha anterior nos termos do presente artigo, quer por força de outras disposições da presente convenção. Qualquer modificação, quanto à determinação da lei aplicável, acorrida posteriormente à celebração do contrato, não afecta a validade formal do contrato, na acepção do disposto no artigo 9o., nem prejudica os direitos de terceiros.

3. A escolha pelas partes de uma lei estrangeira, acompanhada ou não da escolha de um tribunal estrangeiro, não pode, sempre que todos os outros elementos da situação se localizem num único país no momento dessa escolha, prejudicar a aplicação das disposições não derrogáveis por acordo, nos termos da lei desse país, e que a seguir se denominam por «disposições imperativas».

4. A existência e a validade do consentimento das partes, quanto à escolha da lei aplicável, são reguladas pelo disposto nos artigos 8o. 9o.e 11o.

Artigo 4o.

Lei aplicável na falta de escolha

1. Quando a lei aplicável ao contrato não tiver sido escolhida nos termos do artigo 3o., o contrato é regulado pela lei do país com o qual apresente uma conexão mais estreita. Todavia, se uma parte do contrato for separável do resto do contrato e apresentar uma conexão mais estreita com um outro país, a essa parte poderá aplicar-se, a título excepcional, a lei desse outro país.

2. Sem prejuízo do disposto no no. 5, presume-se que o contrato apresenta uma conexão mais estreita com o país onde a parte que está obrigada a fornecer a prestação característica do contrato tem, no momento da celebração do contrato, a sua residência habitual ou, se se tratar de uma sociedade, associação ou pessoa colectiva, a sua administração central. Todavia, se o contrato for celebrado no exercício da actividade económica ou profissional dessa parte, o país a considerar será aquele em que se situa o seu estabelecimento principal ou, se, nos termos do contrato, a prestação deverá ser fornecida por estabelecimento diverso do estabelecimento principal, o da situação desse estabelecimento.

3. Quando o contrato tiver por objecto um direito real sobre um bem imóvel, ou um direito de uso de um bem imóvel, presume-se, em derrogação do disposto no no. 2, que o contrato apresenta uma conexão mais estreita com o país onde o imóvel se situa.

4. A presunção do no. 2 não é admitida quanto ao contrato de transporte de mercadorias. Presume-se que este contrato apresente uma conexão mais estreita com o país em que, no momento da celebração do contrato, o transportador tem o seu estabelecimento principal, se o referido país coincidir com aquele em que se situa o lugar da carga ou da descarga ou do estabelecimento principal do expedidor. Para efeitos de aplicação do presente número, são considerados como contratos de transporte de mercadorias os contratos de fretamento relativos a uma única viagem ou outros contratos que tenham por objecto principal o transporte de mercadorias.

5. O disposto no no. 2 não se aplica se a prestação característica não puder ser determinada. As presunções dos no.s 2, 3 e 4 não serão admitidas sempre que resulte do conjunto das circunstâncias, que o contrato apresenta uma conexão mais estreita com outro país.

Artigo 5o.

Contratos celebrados por consumidores

1. O presente artigo aplica-se aos contratos que tenham por objecto o fornecimento de bens móveis corpóreos ou de serviços a uma pessoa, o «consumidor», para uma finalidade que pode considerar-se estranha à sua actividade profissional, bem como aos contratos destinados ao financiamento desse fornecimento.

2. Não obstante o disposto no artigo 3o., a escolha pelas partes da lei aplicável não pode ter como consequência privar o consumidor da protecção que lhe garantem as disposições imperativas da lei do país em que tenha a sua residência habitual:

- se a celebração do contrato tiver sido precedida, nesse país, de uma proposta que lhe foi especialmente dirigida ou de anúncio publicitário e se o consumidor tiver executado nesse país todos os actos necessários à celebração do contrato ou

- se a outra parte ou o respectivo representante tiver recebido o pedido do consumidor nesse país ou

- se o contrato consistir numa venda de mercadorias e o consumidor se tiver deslocado desse país a um outro país e aí tiver feito o pedido, desde que a viagem tenha sido organizada pelo vendedor com o objectivo de incitar o consumidor a comprar.

3. Não obstante o disposto no artigo 4o. e na falta de escolha feita nos termos do artigo 3o., esses contratos serão regulados pela lei do país em que o consumidor tiver a sua residência habitual, se se verificarem as circunstâncias referidas no no. 2 do presente artigo.

4. O presente artigo, não se aplica:

a) Ao contrato de transporte;

b) Ao contrato de prestação de serviços quando os serviços devidos ao consumidor devam ser prestados exclusivamente num país diferente daquele em que este tem a sua residência habitual.

5. Em derrogação do disposto no no. 4, o presente artigo aplica-se ao contrato que estabeleça, por um preço global, prestações combinadas de transporte e de alojamento.

Artigo 6o.

Contrato individual de trabalho

1. Sem prejuízo do disposto no artigo 3o., a escolha pelas partes da lei aplicável ao contrato de trabalho, não pode ter como consequência privar o trabalhador da protecção que lhe garantem as disposições imperativas da lei que seria aplicável, na falta de escolha, por força do no. 2 do presente artigo.

2. Não obstante o disposto no artigo 4o. e na falta de escolha feita nos termos do artigo 3o., o contrato de trabalho é regulado:

a) Pela lei do país em que o trabalhador, no cumprimento do contrato, presta habitualmente o seu trabalho, mesmo que tenha sido destacado temporariamente para outro país, ou

b) Se o trabalhador não prestar habitualmente o seu trabalho no mesmo país, pela lei do país em que esteja situado o estabelecimento que contratou o trabalhador, a não ser que resulte do conjunto das circunstâncias que o contrato de trabalho apresenta uma conexão mais estreita com um outro país, sendo em tal caso aplicável a lei desse outro país.

Artigo 7o.

Disposições imperativas

1. Ao aplicar-se, por força da presente convenção, a lei de um determinado país, pode ser dada prevalência às disposições imperativas da lei de outro país com o qual a situação apresente uma conexão estreita se, e na medida em que, de acordo com o direito deste último país, essas disposições forem aplicáveis, qualquer que seja a lei reguladora do contrato. Para se decidir se deve ser dada prevalência a estas disposições imperativas, ter-se-á em conta a sua natureza e o seu objecto, bem como as consequências que resultariam da sua aplicação ou da sua não aplicação.

2. O disposto na presente convenção não pode prejudicar a aplicação das regras do país do foro que regulem imperativamente o caso concreto, independentemente da lei aplicável ao contrato.

Existência e validade substancial

1. A existência e a validade do contrato ou de uma disposição deste, estão sujeitas à lei que seria aplicável, por força da presente convenção, se o contrato ou a disposição fossem válidos.

2. Todavia, um contraente, para demonstrar que não deu o seu acordo, pode invocar a lei do país em que tenha a sua residência habitual, se resultar das circunstâncias que não seria razoável que o valor do comportamento desse contraente fosse determinado pela lei prevista no número anterior.

Artigo 9o.

Requisitos de forma

1. Um contrato celebrado entre pessoas que se encontram no mesmo país é formalmente válido desde que preencha os requisitos de forma prescritos pela lei reguladora da substância, aplicável por força da presente convenção ou da lei do país em que foi celebrado.

2. Um contrato celebrado entre pessoas que se encontram em países diferentes é formalmente válido, desde que preencha os requisitos de forma prescritos pela lei reguladora da substância, aplicável por força da presente convenção ou da lei de um desses países.

3. Quando o contrato é celebrado por um representante, o país a tomar em consideração para efeitos de aplicação dos dos no.s 1 e 2, é o país em que os poderes representativos são exercidos.

4. Um acto jurídico unilateral relativo a um contrato celebrado ou a celebrar é formalmente válido, desde que preencha os requisitos de forma prescritos pela lei que regular a substância do contrato, aplicável por força da presente convenção ou da lei do país em que esse acto é praticado.

5. O disposto nos números anteriores não se aplica aos contratos que caem no âmbito de aplicação do artigo 5o., celebrados nas circunstâncias enunciadas no no. 2 desse artigo. A forma desses contratos é regulada pela lei do país em que o consumidor tem a sua residência habitual.

6. Em derrogação do disposto nos no.s 1 a 4, qualquer contrato que tenha por objecto um direito real sobre um imóvel ou um direito de uso de um imóvel está sujeito, quanto à forma, às disposições imperativas da lei do país em que o imóvel está situado, desde que, nos termos desta lei, essas regras se apliquem independentemente do lugar de celebração e da lei reguladora da substância do contrato.

Âmbito de aplicação da lei do contrato

1. A lei aplicável ao contrato por força dos artigos 3o. a 6o. e do artigo 12o. da presente convenção, regula, nomeadamente:

a) A sua interpretação;

b) O cumprimento das obrigações dele decorrentes;

b) O cumprimento das obrigações dele decorrentes;

c) Nos limites dos poderes atribuídos ao tribunal pela respectiva lei do processo, as consequências do incumprimento total ou parcial dessas obrigações, incluindo a avaliação do dano, na medida em que esta seja regulada pela lei;

d) As diversas causas de extinção das obrigações, bem como a prescrição e a caducidade fundadas no decurso de um prazo;

e) As consequências da invalidade do contrato.

2. Quanto aos modos de cumprimento e às medidas que o credor deve tomar no caso de cumprimento defeituoso, atender-se-á à lei do país onde é cumprida a obrigação.

Artigo 11o.

Incapacidade

Num contrato celebrado entre pessoas que se encontram no mesmo país, uma pessoa singular considerada capaz segundo a lei desse país só pode invocar a sua incapacidade que resulte de uma outra lei se, no momento da celebração do contrato, o outro contraente tinha conhecimento dessa incapacidade ou a desconhecia por imprudência da sua parte.

Artigo 12o.

Cessão de créditos

1. As obrigações entre o cedente e o cessionário de um crédito são reguladas pela lei que, por força da presente convenção, for aplicável ao contrato que os liga.

2. A lei que regula o crédito cedido determina a natureza cedível deste, as relações entre o cessionário e o devedor, as condições de oponibilidade da cessão ao devedor e a natureza liberatória da prestação feita pelo devedor.

Artigo 13o.

Sub-rogação

1. Sempre que, por força de um contrato, uma pessoa, o «credor», tenha direitos relativamente a outra pessoa, o «devedor» e um terceiro tenha a obrigação de satisfazer o direito do credor, ou ainda, se o terceiro tiver realizado a prestação devida em cumprimento dessa obrigação, a lei aplicável a esta obrigação do terceiro determina se este pode exercer, no todo ou em parte, os direitos do credor contra o devedor, segundo a lei que regula as suas relações.

2. A mesma regra aplica-se quando várias pessoas estão adstritas à mesma obrigação contratual e o credor tenha sido satisfeito por uma delas.

Prova

1. A lei que regula o contrato, por força da presente convenção, aplica-se na medida em que, em matéria de obrigações contratuais, estabeleça presunções legais ou reparta o ónus da prova.

2. Os actos jurídicos podem ser provados mediante qualquer meio de prova admitido, quer pela lei do foro quer por uma das leis referidas no artigo 9o., segundo a qual o acto seja formalmente válido, desde que a prova possa ser produzida desse modo no tribunal a que a causa foi submetida.

Artigo 15o.

Por aplicação da lei de um país determinado pela presente convenção entende-se a aplicação das normas de direito em vigor nesse país, com exclusão das normas de direito internacional privado.

Artigo 16o.

A aplicação de uma disposição da lei designada pela presente convenção só pode ser afastada se essa aplicação for manifestamente incompatível com a ordem pública do foro.

EXPLANATORY REPORT on the Convention on the accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden to the Convention on the Law applicable to Contractual Obligations, opened for signature in Rome on 19 June 1980, and to the first and second Protocols on its interpretation by the Court of Justice (Text approved by the Council on 26 May 1997) (97/C 191/02)

INTRODUCTION

The Convention on the Law applicable to Contractual Obligations, opened for signature in Rome on 19 June 1980 (Rome Convention of 1980), lays down uniform choice-of-law rules to apply within its specific area of application. These rules constitute an important supplement to the Convention on Jurisdiction and the Enforcement of Judgments in Civil and Commercial Matters of 27 September 1968 (1968 Brussels Convention). Pursuant to Article 28 of the Rome Convention of 1980, that Convention may be signed (only) by States party to the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community.

In order that the rules thus uniformized may be also applied to the new Member States which, in acceding to the European Union, undertook to accede also to the Rome Convention of 1980, the Permanent Representatives Committee agreed on 1 February 1996 to set up a working party to prepare the accession of the three new Member States to the 1968 Brussels and the 1980 Rome Conventions and the Protocols thereto as adapted and amended by subsequent accession conventions. Over two meetings, the Working Party drafted the technical amendments necessary for the accession of the three States in question.

A technical adjustment is also made to the first Protocol on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the European Communities of the Convention on the Law applicable to Contractual Obligations, signed on 19 December 1988, hereafter referred to as the 'first Protocol of 1988`, listing the supreme courts in the acceding States.

The first Protocol of 1988 and the Protocol conferring on the Court of Justice of the European Communities Certain Powers to Interpret the Convention on the Law applicable to Contractual Obligations signed on 19 December 1988 and hereafter referred to as the 'second Protocol of 1988` (together commonly referred to as the '1988 interpretative protocols`), are designed to ensure uniform interpretation of the Rome Convention of 1980. They have not yet entered into force.

Austria's proposal that the Accession Convention be used as an opportunity to extend the consumer protection provisions in Article 5 of the Rome Convention of 1980 aroused interest in the Working Party. However, it emerged that this was a rather complex issue that would require detailed consideration, and would therefore hold up completion of the proceedings. When adopting the Accession Convention on 29 November 1996, the Conference of Governments of the Member States accordingly approved a declaration by the Austrian delegation advocating early consideration of this question. That declaration was annexed to the minutes of the Conference.

The Accession Convention contains final provisions. Lastly, the Accession Convention contains an adjustment to the Protocol annexed to the Rome Convention of 1980 which, in addition to Denmark, now also allows Sweden and Finland to retain their national provisions concerning the law applicable to the carriage of goods by sea.

TITLE I

General provisions

Article 1

This provision expressly provides for the accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden and specifies the three instruments concerned, namely the Rome Convention of 1980 and the first and second Protocols of 1988.

The Rome Convention of 1980 was amended by two previous accession conventions: the Convention, hereafter referred to as the '1984 Accession Convention` signed in Luxembourg on 10 April 1984 on the Accession of the Hellenic Republic, and the Convention, hereafter referred to as the '1992 Accession Convention` signed in Funchal on 18 May 1992 on the Accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic. It is to this amended version of the Rome Convention of 1980 that the three new Member States are acceding.

TITLE II

Adjustments to the Protocol annexed to the Rome Convention of 1980

Article 2

Article 21 of the Rome Convention of 1980 allows Member States to retain diverging national provisions if they are based on an international convention to which the State in question is a party. The Danish choice-of-law rules on the carriage of goods by sea diverge from the Rome Convention of 1980 but accord with legislation in the other Nordic countries. However, the uniformization of provisions achieved amongst the Nordic countries in this sphere was (in the customary manner) not based on an international convention, but secured through the simultaneous enactment of identically worded laws by those countries' parliaments, so that Article 21 does not apply in this case, although the uniformization thus achieved is entirely similar in effect to that resulting from an international convention. To enable Denmark to retain these common provisions, a Protocol to that effect was annexed to the Rome Convention of 1980.

As Sweden and Finland took part in the Nordic countries' uniformization of rules and should therefore be treated in the same manner as Denmark, Article 2 now extends this Protocol to Sweden and Finland, and the references to the relevant Danish provisions are updated.

However, the Member States thought it advisable to make a joint declaration, which is annexed to the Convention, in which they take note that Denmark, Finland and Sweden state their readiness to examine the extent to which they will be able to ensure that any future amendment concerning their national law applicable to questions relating to the carriage of goods by sea complies with the procedure provided for in Article 23 of the Rome Convention of 1980.

TITLE III

Adjustments to the first Protocol of 1988

Article 3

Article 2 (a) of the first Protocol of 1988 lists the supreme courts in the Member States which may submit questions of interpretation to the Court of Justice of the European Communities for a preliminary ruling. The supreme courts in the new Member States are now added to that list.

TITLE IV

Articles 4 to 8

The final provisions, modelled on the 1984 and 1992 Accession Conventions, give the Finnish and Swedish versions of the Rome Convention of 1980 and the First and Second Protocols of 1988 the same legal status as the other language versions, stipulate the need for ratification of the Accession Convention by the Signatory States, contain provisions on its entry into force, and specify that the Accession Convention is equally authentic in all 12 official languages.

When the Accession Convention was signed, the texts of the Rome Convention of 1980, the first and second Protocols thereto, and the amendments resulting from subsequent accessions, were drawn up in Finnish and Swedish.

of 17 June 2008

on the law applicable to contractual obligations (Rome I)

THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION,

Having regard to the Treaty establishing the European Community, and in particular Article 61(c) and the second indent of Article 67(5) thereof,

Having regard to the proposal from the Commission,

Having regard to the opinion of the European Economic and Social Committee ([1]),

Acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 251 of the Treaty ([2]),

Whereas:

(1) The Community has set itself the objective of maintaining and developing an area of freedom, security and justice. For the progressive establishment of such an area, the Community is to adopt measures relating to judicial cooperation in civil matters with a cross-border impact to the extent necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market.

(2) According to Article 65, point (b) of the Treaty, these measures are to include those promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws and of jurisdiction.

(3) The European Council meeting in Tampere on 15 and 16 October 1999 endorsed the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and other decisions of judicial authorities as the cornerstone of judicial cooperation in civil matters and invited the Council and the Commission to adopt a programme of measures to implement that principle.

(4) On 30 November 2000 the Council adopted a joint Commission and Council programme of measures for implementation of the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in civil and commercial matters ([3]). The programme identifies measures relating to the harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules as those facilitating the mutual recognition of judgments.

(5) The Hague Programme ([4]), adopted by the European Council on 5 November 2004, called for work to be pursued actively on the conflict-of-law rules regarding contractual obligations (Rome I).

(6) The proper functioning of the internal market creates a need, in order to improve the predictability of the outcome of litigation, certainty as to the law applicable and the free movement of judgments, for the conflict-of-law rules in the Member States to designate the same national law irrespective of the country of the court in which an action is brought.

(7) The substantive scope and the provisions of this Regulation should be consistent with Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters ([5]) (Brussels I) and Regulation (EC) No 864/2007 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 July 2007 on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II) ([6]).

(8) Family relationships should cover parentage, marriage, affinity and collateral relatives. The reference in Article 1(2) to relationships having comparable effects to marriage and other family relationships should be interpreted in accordance with the law of the Member State in which the court is seised.

(9) Obligations under bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments should also cover bills of lading to the extent that the obligations under the bill of lading arise out of its negotiable character.

(10) Obligations arising out of dealings prior to the conclusion of the contract are covered by Article 12 of Regulation (EC) No 864/2007. Such obligations should therefore be excluded from the scope of this Regulation.

(11) The parties' freedom to choose the applicable law should be one of the cornerstones of the system of conflict-of-law rules in matters of contractual obligations.

(12) An agreement between the parties to confer on one or more courts or tribunals of a Member State exclusive jurisdiction to determine disputes under the contract should be one of the factors to be taken into account in determining whether a choice of law has been clearly demonstrated.

(13) This Regulation does not preclude parties from incorporating by reference into their contract a non-State body of law or an international convention.

(14) Should the Community adopt, in an appropriate legal instrument, rules of substantive contract law, including standard terms and conditions, such instrument may provide that the parties may choose to apply those rules.

(15) Where a choice of law is made and all other elements relevant to the situation are located in a country other than the country whose law has been chosen, the choice of law should not prejudice the application of provisions of the law of that country which cannot be derogated from by agreement. This rule should apply whether or not the choice of law was accompanied by a choice of court or tribunal. Whereas no substantial change is intended as compared with Article 3(3) of the 1980 Convention on the Law Applicable to Contractual Obligations ([1]) (the Rome Convention), the wording of this Regulation is aligned as far as possible with Article 14 of Regulation (EC) No 864/2007.

(16) To contribute to the general objective of this Regulation, legal certainty in the European judicial area, the conflict-of-law rules should be highly foreseeable. The courts should, however, retain a degree of discretion to determine the law that is most closely connected to the situation.

(17) As far as the applicable law in the absence of choice is concerned, the concept of 'provision of services' and 'sale of goods' should be interpreted in the same way as when applying Article 5 of Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 in so far as sale of goods and provision of services are covered by that Regulation. Although franchise and distribution contracts are contracts for services, they are the subject of specific rules.

(18) As far as the applicable law in the absence of choice is concerned, multilateral systems should be those in which trading is conducted, such as regulated markets and multilateral trading facilities as referred to in Article 4 of Directive 2004/39/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 21 April 2004 on markets in financial instruments ([2]), regardless of whether or not they rely on a central counterparty.

(19) Where there has been no choice of law, the applicable law should be determined in accordance with the rule specified for the particular type of contract. Where the contract cannot be categorised as being one of the specified types or where its elements fall within more than one of the specified types, it should be governed by the law of the country where the party required to effect the characteristic performance of the contract has his habitual residence. In the case of a contract consisting of a bundle of rights and obligations capable of being categorised as falling within more than one of the specified types of contract, the characteristic performance of the contract should be determined having regard to its centre of gravity.

(20) Where the contract is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in Article 4(1) or (2), an escape clause should provide that the law of that other country is to apply. In order to determine that country, account should be taken, inter alia, of whether the contract in question has a very close relationship with another contract or contracts.

(21) In the absence of choice, where the applicable law cannot be determined either on the basis of the fact that the contract can be categorised as one of the specified types or as being the law of the country of habitual residence of the party required to effect the characteristic performance of the contract, the contract should be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected. In order to determine that country, account should be taken, inter alia, of whether the contract in question has a very close relationship with another contract or contracts.

(22) As regards the interpretation of contracts for the carriage of goods, no change in substance is intended with respect to Article 4(4), third sentence, of the Rome Convention. Consequently, single-voyage charter parties and other contracts the main purpose of which is the carriage of goods should be treated as contracts for the carriage of goods. For the purposes of this Regulation, the term 'consignor' should refer to any person who enters into a contract of carriage with the carrier and the term 'the carrier' should refer to the party to the contract who undertakes to carry the goods, whether or not he performs the carriage himself.

(23) As regards contracts concluded with parties regarded as being weaker, those parties should be protected by conflict-of-law rules that are more favourable to their interests than the general rules.

(24) With more specific reference to consumer contracts, the conflict-of-law rule should make it possible to cut the cost of settling disputes concerning what are commonly relatively small claims and to take account of the development of distance-selling techniques. Consistency with Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 requires both that there be a reference to the concept of directed activity as a condition for applying the consumer protection rule and that the concept be interpreted harmoniously in Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 and this Regulation, bearing in mind that a joint declaration by the Council and the Commission on Article 15 of Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 states that 'for Article 15(1)(c) to be applicable it is not sufficient for an undertaking to target its activities at the Member State of the consumer's residence, or at a number of Member States including that Member State; a contract must also be concluded within the framework of its activities'. The declaration also states that 'the mere fact that an Internet site is accessible is not sufficient for Article 15 to be applicable, although a factor will be that this Internet site solicits the conclusion of distance contracts and that a contract has actually been concluded at a distance, by whatever means. In this respect, the language or currency which a website uses does not constitute a relevant factor.'.

(25) Consumers should be protected by such rules of the country of their habitual residence that cannot be derogated from by agreement, provided that the consumer contract has been concluded as a result of the professional pursuing his commercial or professional activities in that particular country. The same protection should be guaranteed if the professional, while not pursuing his commercial or professional activities in the country where the consumer has his habitual residence, directs his activities by any means to that country or to several countries, including that country, and the contract is concluded as a result of such activities.

(26) For the purposes of this Regulation, financial services such as investment services and activities and ancillary services provided by a professional to a consumer, as referred to in sections A and B of Annex I to Directive 2004/39/EC, and contracts for the sale of units in collective investment undertakings, whether or not covered by Council Directive 85/611/EEC of 20 December 1985 on the coordination of laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to undertakings for collective investment in transferable securities (UCITS) ([1]), should be subject to Article 6 of this Regulation. Consequently, when a reference is made to terms and conditions governing the issuance or offer to the public of transferable securities or to the subscription and redemption of units in collective investment undertakings, that reference should include all aspects binding the issuer or the offeror to the consumer, but should not include those aspects involving the provision of financial services.

(27) Various exceptions should be made to the general conflict-of-law rule for consumer contracts. Under one such exception the general rule should not apply to contracts relating to rights in rem in immovable property or tenancies of such property unless the contract relates to the right to use immovable property on a timeshare basis within the meaning of Directive 94/47/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 October 1994 on the protection of purchasers in respect of certain aspects of contracts relating to the purchase of the right to use immovable properties on a timeshare basis ([2]).

(28) It is important to ensure that rights and obligations which constitute a financial instrument are not covered by the general rule applicable to consumer contracts, as that could lead to different laws being applicable to each of the instruments issued, therefore changing their nature and preventing their fungible trading and offering. Likewise, whenever such instruments are issued or offered, the contractual relationship established between the issuer or the offeror and the consumer should not necessarily be subject to the mandatory application of the law of the country of habitual residence of the consumer, as there is a need to ensure uniformity in the terms and conditions of an issuance or an offer. The same rationale should apply with regard to the multilateral systems covered by Article 4(1)(h), in respect of which it should be ensured that the law of the country of habitual residence of the consumer will not interfere with the rules applicable to contracts concluded within those systems or with the operator of such systems.

(29) For the purposes of this Regulation, references to rights and obligations constituting the terms and conditions governing the issuance, offers to the public or public take-over bids of transferable securities and references to the subscription and redemption of units in collective investment undertakings should include the terms governing, inter alia, the allocation of securities or units, rights in the event of over-subscription, withdrawal rights and similar matters in the context of the offer as well as those matters referred to in Articles 10, 11, 12 and 13, thus ensuring that all relevant contractual aspects of an offer binding the issuer or the offeror to the consumer are governed by a single law.

(30) For the purposes of this Regulation, financial instruments and transferable securities are those instruments referred to in Article 4 of Directive 2004/39/EC.

(31) Nothing in this Regulation should prejudice the operation of a formal arrangement designated as a system under Article 2(a) of Directive 98/26/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 19 May 1998 on settlement finality in payment and securities settlement systems ([3]).

(32) Owing to the particular nature of contracts of carriage and insurance contracts, specific provisions should ensure an adequate level of protection of passengers and policy holders. Therefore, Article 6 should not apply in the context of those particular contracts.

(33) Where an insurance contract not covering a large risk covers more than one risk, at least one of which is situated in a Member State and at least one of which is situated in a third country, the special rules on insurance contracts in this Regulation should apply only to the risk or risks situated in the relevant Member State or Member States.

(34) The rule on individual employment contracts should not prejudice the application of the overriding mandatory provisions of the country to which a worker is posted in accordance with Directive 96/71/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 December 1996 concerning the posting of workers in the framework of the provision of services ([4]).

(35) Employees should not be deprived of the protection afforded to them by provisions which cannot be derogated from by agreement or which can only be derogated from to their benefit.

(36) As regards individual employment contracts, work carried out in another country should be regarded as temporary if the employee is expected to resume working in the country of origin after carrying out his tasks abroad. The conclusion of a new contract of employment with the original employer or an employer belonging to the same group of companies as the original employer should not preclude the employee from being regarded as carrying out his work in another country temporarily.

(37) Considerations of public interest justify giving the courts of the Member States the possibility, in exceptional circumstances, of applying exceptions based on public policy and overriding mandatory provisions. The concept of 'overriding mandatory provisions' should be distinguished from the expression 'provisions which cannot be derogated from by agreement' and should be construed more restrictively.

(38) In the context of voluntary assignment, the term 'relationship' should make it clear that Article 14(1) also applies to the property aspects of an assignment, as between assignor and assignee, in legal orders where such aspects are treated separately from the aspects under the law of obligations. However, the term 'relationship' should not be understood as relating to any relationship that may exist between assignor and assignee. In particular, it should not cover preliminary questions as regards a voluntary assignment or a contractual subrogation. The term should be strictly limited to the aspects which are directly relevant to the voluntary assignment or contractual subrogation in question.

(39) For the sake of legal certainty there should be a clear definition of habitual residence, in particular for companies and other bodies, corporate or unincorporated. Unlike Article 60(1) of Regulation (EC) No 44/2001, which establishes three criteria, the conflict-of-law rule should proceed on the basis of a single criterion; otherwise, the parties would be unable to foresee the law applicable to their situation.

(40) A situation where conflict-of-law rules are dispersed among several instruments and where there are differences between those rules should be avoided. This Regulation, however, should not exclude the possibility of inclusion of conflict-of-law rules relating to contractual obligations in provisions of Community law with regard to particular matters.

This Regulation should not prejudice the application of other instruments laying down provisions designed to contribute to the proper functioning of the internal market in so far as they cannot be applied in conjunction with the law designated by the rules of this Regulation. The application of provisions of the applicable law designated by the rules of this Regulation should not restrict the free movement of goods and services as regulated by Community instruments, such as Directive 2000/31/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 8 June 2000 on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce, in the Internal Market (Directive on electronic commerce) ([1]).

(41) Respect for international commitments entered into by the Member States means that this Regulation should not affect international conventions to which one or more Member States are parties at the time when this Regulation is adopted. To make the rules more accessible, the Commission should publish the list of the relevant conventions in the Official Journal of the European Union on the basis of information supplied by the Member States.

(42) The Commission will make a proposal to the European Parliament and to the Council concerning the procedures and conditions according to which Member States would be entitled to negotiate and conclude, on their own behalf, agreements with third countries in individual and exceptional cases, concerning sectoral matters and containing provisions on the law applicable to contractual obligations.

(43) Since the objective of this Regulation cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States and can therefore, by reason of the scale and effects of this Regulation, be better achieved at Community level, the Community may adopt measures, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity as set out in Article 5 of the Treaty. In accordance with the principle of proportionality, as set out in that Article, this Regulation does not go beyond what is necessary to attain its objective.

(44) In accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and to the Treaty establishing the European Community, Ireland has notified its wish to take part in the adoption and application of the present Regulation.

(45) In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and to the Treaty establishing the European Community, and without prejudice to Article 4 of the said Protocol, the United Kingdom is not taking part in the adoption of this Regulation and is not bound by it or subject to its application.

(46) In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and to the Treaty establishing the European Community, Denmark is not taking part in the adoption of this Regulation and is not bound by it or subject to its application,

It shall not apply, in particular, to revenue, customs or administrative matters.

3. This Regulation shall not apply to evidence and procedure, without prejudice to Article 18.

4. In this Regulation, the term 'Member State' shall mean Member States to which this Regulation applies. However, in Article 3(4) and Article 7 the term shall mean all the Member States.

Article 2

Universal application

Any law specified by this Regulation shall be applied whether or not it is the law of a Member State.

CHAPTER II

UNIFORM RULES

Article 3

Freedom of choice

1. A contract shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties. The choice shall be made expressly or clearly demonstrated by the terms of the contract or the circumstances of the case. By their choice the parties can select the law applicable to the whole or to part only of the contract.

2. The parties may at any time agree to subject the contract to a law other than that which previously governed it, whether as a result of an earlier choice made under this Article or of other provisions of this Regulation. Any change in the law to be applied that is made after the conclusion of the contract shall not prejudice its formal validity under Article 11 or adversely affect the rights of third parties.

3. Where all other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are located in a country other than the country whose law has been chosen, the choice of the parties shall not prejudice the application of provisions of the law of that other country which cannot be derogated from by agreement.

4. Where all other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are located in one or more Member States, the parties' choice of applicable law other than that of a Member State shall not prejudice the application of provisions of Community law, where appropriate as implemented in the Member State of the forum, which cannot be derogated from by agreement.

5. The existence and validity of the consent of the parties as to the choice of the applicable law shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of Articles 10, 11 and 13.

Article 4

Applicable law in the absence of choice

1. To the extent that the law applicable to the contract has not been chosen in accordance with Article 3 and without prejudice to Articles 5 to 8, the law governing the contract shall be determined as follows:

(a) a contract for the sale of goods shall be governed by the law of the country where the seller has his habitual residence;

(b) a contract for the provision of services shall be governed by the law of the country where the service provider has his habitual residence;

(c) a contract relating to a right in rem in immovable property or to a tenancy of immovable property shall be governed by the law of the country where the property is situated;

(d) notwithstanding point (c), a tenancy of immovable property concluded for temporary private use for a period of no more than six consecutive months shall be governed by the law of the country where the landlord has his habitual residence, provided that the tenant is a natural person and has his habitual residence in the same country;

(e) a franchise contract shall be governed by the law of the country where the franchisee has his habitual residence;

(f) a distribution contract shall be governed by the law of the country where the distributor has his habitual residence;

(g) a contract for the sale of goods by auction shall be governed by the law of the country where the auction takes place, if such a place can be determined;

(h) a contract concluded within a multilateral system which brings together or facilitates the bringing together of multiple third-party buying and selling interests in financial instruments, as defined by Article 4(1), point (17) of Directive 2004/39/EC, in accordance with non-discretionary rules and governed by a single law, shall be governed by that law.

2. Where the contract is not covered by paragraph 1 or where the elements of the contract would be covered by more than one of points (a) to (h) of paragraph 1, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country where the party required to effect the characteristic performance of the contract has his habitual residence.

3. Where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the contract is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in paragraphs 1 or 2, the law of that other country shall apply.

4. Where the law applicable cannot be determined pursuant to paragraphs 1 or 2, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected.

Contracts of carriage

1. To the extent that the law applicable to a contract for the carriage of goods has not been chosen in accordance with Article 3, the law applicable shall be the law of the country of habitual residence of the carrier, provided that the place of receipt or the place of delivery or the habitual residence of the consignor is also situated in that country. If those requirements are not met, the law of the country where the place of delivery as agreed by the parties is situated shall apply.

2. To the extent that the law applicable to a contract for the carriage of passengers has not been chosen by the parties in accordance with the second subparagraph, the law applicable shall be the law of the country where the passenger has his habitual residence, provided that either the place of departure or the place of destination is situated in that country. If these requirements are not met, the law of the country where the carrier has his habitual residence shall apply.

The parties may choose as the law applicable to a contract for the carriage of passengers in accordance with Article 3 only the law of the country where:

(a) the passenger has his habitual residence; or

(b) the carrier has his habitual residence; or

(c) the carrier has his place of central administration; or

(d) the place of departure is situated; or

(e) the place of destination is situated.

3. Where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the contract, in the absence of a choice of law, is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in paragraphs 1 or 2, the law of that other country shall apply.

Article 6

Consumer contracts

1. Without prejudice to Articles 5 and 7, a contract concluded by a natural person for a purpose which can be regarded as being outside his trade or profession (the consumer) with another person acting in the exercise of his trade or profession (the professional) shall be governed by the law of the country where the consumer has his habitual residence, provided that the professional:

(a) pursues his commercial or professional activities in the country where the consumer has his habitual residence, or

(b) by any means, directs such activities to that country or to several countries including that country, and the contract falls within the scope of such activities.

2. Notwithstanding paragraph 1, the parties may choose the law applicable to a contract which fulfils the requirements of paragraph 1, in accordance with Article 3. Such a choice may not, however, have the result of depriving the consumer of the protection afforded to him by provisions that cannot be derogated from by agreement by virtue of the law which, in the absence of choice, would have been applicable on the basis of paragraph 1.

3. If the requirements in points (a) or (b) of paragraph 1 are not fulfilled, the law applicable to a contract between a consumer and a professional shall be determined pursuant to Articles 3 and 4.

4. Paragraphs 1 and 2 shall not apply to:

(a) a contract for the supply of services where the services are to be supplied to the consumer exclusively in a country other than that in which he has his habitual residence;

(b) a contract of carriage other than a contract relating to package travel within the meaning of Council Directive 90/314/EEC of 13 June 1990 on package travel, package holidays and package tours [1];

(c) a contract relating to a right in rem in immovable property or a tenancy of immovable property other than a contract relating to the right to use immovable properties on a timeshare basis within the meaning of Directive 94/47/EC;

(d) rights and obligations which constitute a financial instrument and rights and obligations constituting the terms and conditions governing the issuance or offer to the public and public take-over bids of transferable securities, and the subscription and redemption of units in collective investment undertakings in so far as these activities do not constitute provision of a financial service;

(e) a contract concluded within the type of system falling within the scope of Article 4(1)(h).

Article 7

Insurance contracts

1. This Article shall apply to contracts referred to in paragraph 2, whether or not the risk covered is situated in a Member State, and to all other insurance contracts covering risks situated inside the territory of the Member States. It shall not apply to reinsurance contracts.

2. An insurance contract covering a large risk as defined in Article 5(d) of the First Council Directive 73/239/EEC of 24 July 1973 on the coordination of laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the taking-up and pursuit of the business of direct insurance other than life assurance [2] shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties in accordance with Article 3 of this Regulation.

To the extent that the applicable law has not been chosen by the parties, the insurance contract shall be governed by the law of the country where the insurer has his habitual residence. Where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the contract is manifestly more closely connected with another country, the law of that other country shall apply.

3. In the case of an insurance contract other than a contract falling within paragraph 2, only the following laws may be chosen by the parties in accordance with Article 3:

(a) the law of any Member State where the risk is situated at the time of conclusion of the contract;

(b) the law of the country where the policy holder has his habitual residence;

(c) in the case of life assurance, the law of the Member State of which the policy holder is a national;

(d) for insurance contracts covering risks limited to events occurring in one Member State other than the Member State where the risk is situated, the law of that Member State;

(e) where the policy holder of a contract falling under this paragraph pursues a commercial or industrial activity or a liberal profession and the insurance contract covers two or more risks which relate to those activities and are situated in different Member States, the law of any of the Member States concerned or the law of the country of habitual residence of the policy holder.

Where, in the cases set out in points (a), (b) or (e), the Member States referred to grant greater freedom of choice of the law applicable to the insurance contract, the parties may take advantage of that freedom.

To the extent that the law applicable has not been chosen by the parties in accordance with this paragraph, such a contract shall be governed by the law of the Member State in which the risk is situated at the time of conclusion of the contract.

4. The following additional rules shall apply to insurance contracts covering risks for which a Member State imposes an obligation to take out insurance:

(a) the insurance contract shall not satisfy the obligation to take out insurance unless it complies with the specific provisions relating to that insurance laid down by the Member State that imposes the obligation. Where the law of the Member State in which the risk is situated and the law of the Member State imposing the obligation to take out insurance contradict each other, the latter shall prevail;

(b) by way of derogation from paragraphs 2 and 3, a Member State may lay down that the insurance contract shall be governed by the law of the Member State that imposes the obligation to take out insurance.

5. For the purposes of paragraph 3, third subparagraph, and paragraph 4, where the contract covers risks situated in more than one Member State, the contract shall be considered as constituting several contracts each relating to only one Member State.

6. For the purposes of this Article, the country in which the risk is situated shall be determined in accordance with Article 2(d) of the Second Council Directive 88/357/EEC of 22 June 1988 on the coordination of laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to direct insurance other than life assurance and laying down provisions to facilitate the effective exercise of freedom to provide services [1] and, in the case of life assurance, the country in which the risk is situated shall be the country of the commitment within the meaning of Article 1(1)(g) of Directive 2002/83/EC.

Individual employment contracts

1. An individual employment contract shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties in accordance with Article 3. Such a choice of law may not, however, have the result of depriving the employee of the protection afforded to him by provisions that cannot be derogated from by agreement under the law that, in the absence of choice, would have been applicable pursuant to paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of this Article.

2. To the extent that the law applicable to the individual employment contract has not been chosen by the parties, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country in which or, failing that, from which the employee habitually carries out his work in performance of the contract. The country where the work is habitually carried out shall not be deemed to have changed if he is temporarily employed in another country.

3. Where the law applicable cannot be determined pursuant to paragraph 2, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country where the place of business through which the employee was engaged is situated.

4. Where it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in paragraphs 2 or 3, the law of that other country shall apply.

Article 9

Overriding mandatory provisions

1. Overriding mandatory provisions are provisions the respect for which is regarded as crucial by a country for safeguarding its public interests, such as its political, social or economic organisation, to such an extent that they are applicable to any situation falling within their scope, irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the contract under this Regulation.

2. Nothing in this Regulation shall restrict the application of the overriding mandatory provisions of the law of the forum.

3. Effect may be given to the overriding mandatory provisions of the law of the country where the obligations arising out of the contract have to be or have been performed, in so far as those overriding mandatory provisions render the performance of the contract unlawful. In considering whether to give effect to those provisions, regard shall be had to their nature and purpose and to the consequences of their application or non-application.

Article 10

Consent and material validity

1. The existence and validity of a contract, or of any term of a contract, shall be determined by the law which would govern it under this Regulation if the contract or term were valid.

2. Nevertheless, a party, in order to establish that he did not consent, may rely upon the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence if it appears from the circumstances that it would not be reasonable to determine the effect of his conduct in accordance with the law specified in paragraph 1.

Article 11

Formal validity

1. A contract concluded between persons who, or whose agents, are in the same country at the time of its conclusion is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it in substance under this Regulation or of the law of the country where it is concluded.

2. A contract concluded between persons who, or whose agents, are in different countries at the time of its conclusion is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it in substance under this Regulation, or of the law of either of the countries where either of the parties or their agent is present at the time of conclusion, or of the law of the country where either of the parties had his habitual residence at that time.

3. A unilateral act intended to have legal effect relating to an existing or contemplated contract is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs or would govern the contract in substance under this Regulation, or of the law of the country where the act was done, or of the law of the country where the person by whom it was done had his habitual residence at that time.

4. Paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of this Article shall not apply to contracts that fall within the scope of Article 6. The form of such contracts shall be governed by the law of the country where the consumer has his habitual residence.

5. Notwithstanding paragraphs 1 to 4, a contract the subject matter of which is a right in rem in immovable property or a tenancy of immovable property shall be subject to the requirements of form of the law of the country where the property is situated if by that law:

(a) those requirements are imposed irrespective of the country where the contract is concluded and irrespective of the law governing the contract; and

(b) those requirements cannot be derogated from by agreement.

Article 12

Scope of the law applicable

1. The law applicable to a contract by virtue of this Regulation shall govern in particular:

(a) interpretation;

(b) performance;

(c) within the limits of the powers conferred on the court by its procedural law, the consequences of a total or partial breach of obligations, including the assessment of damages in so far as it is governed by rules of law;

(d) the various ways of extinguishing obligations, and prescription and limitation of actions;

(e) the consequences of nullity of the contract.

2. In relation to the manner of performance and the steps to be taken in the event of defective performance, regard shall be had to the law of the country in which performance takes place.

Article 13

Incapacity

In a contract concluded between persons who are in the same country, a natural person who would have capacity under the law of that country may invoke his incapacity resulting from the law of another country, only if the other party to the contract was aware of that incapacity at the time of the conclusion of the contract or was not aware thereof as a result of negligence.

Article 14

Voluntary assignment and contractual subrogation

1. The relationship between assignor and assignee under a voluntary assignment or contractual subrogation of a claim against another person (the debtor) shall be governed by the law that applies to the contract between the assignor and assignee under this Regulation.

2. The law governing the assigned or subrogated claim shall determine its assignability, the relationship between the assignee and the debtor, the conditions under which the assignment or subrogation can be invoked against the debtor and whether the debtor's obligations have been discharged.

3. The concept of assignment in this Article includes outright transfers of claims, transfers of claims by way of security and pledges or other security rights over claims.

Legal subrogation

Where a person (the creditor) has a contractual claim against another (the debtor) and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, or has in fact satisfied the creditor in discharge of that duty, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether and to what extent the third person is entitled to exercise against the debtor the rights which the creditor had against the debtor under the law governing their relationship.

Article 16

Multiple liability

If a creditor has a claim against several debtors who are liable for the same claim, and one of the debtors has already satisfied the claim in whole or in part, the law governing the debtor's obligation towards the creditor also governs the debtor's right to claim recourse from the other debtors. The other debtors may rely on the defences they had against the creditor to the extent allowed by the law governing their obligations towards the creditor.

Article 17

Set-off

Where the right to set-off is not agreed by the parties, set-off shall be governed by the law applicable to the claim against which the right to set-off is asserted.

Article 18

Burden of proof

1. The law governing a contractual obligation under this Regulation shall apply to the extent that, in matters of contractual obligations, it contains rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. A contract or an act intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognised by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 11 under which that contract or act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

CHAPTER III

OTHER PROVISIONS

Article 19

Habitual residence

1. For the purposes of this Regulation, the habitual residence of companies and other bodies, corporate or unincorporated, shall be the place of central administration.

The habitual residence of a natural person acting in the course of his business activity shall be his principal place of business.

2. Where the contract is concluded in the course of the operations of a branch, agency or any other establishment, or if, under the contract, performance is the responsibility of such a branch, agency or establishment, the place where the branch, agency or any other establishment is located shall be treated as the place of habitual residence.

3. For the purposes of determining the habitual residence, the relevant point in time shall be the time of the conclusion of the contract.

Article 20

Exclusion of renvoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Regulation means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law, unless provided otherwise in this Regulation.

Article 21

Public policy of the forum

The application of a provision of the law of any country specified by this Regulation may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy (ordre public) of the forum.

Article 22

States with more than one legal system

1. Where a State comprises several territorial units, each of which has its own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Regulation.

2. A Member State where different territorial units have their own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations shall not be required to apply this Regulation to conflicts solely between the laws of such units.

Article 23

Relationship with other provisions of Community law

With the exception of Article 7, this Regulation shall not prejudice the application of provisions of Community law which, in relation to particular matters, lay down conflict-of-law rules relating to contractual obligations.

Article 24

Relationship with the Rome Convention

1. This Regulation shall replace the Rome Convention in the Member States, except as regards the territories of the Member States which fall within the territorial scope of that Convention and to which this Regulation does not apply pursuant to Article 299 of the Treaty.

2. In so far as this Regulation replaces the provisions of the Rome Convention, any reference to that Convention shall be understood as a reference to this Regulation.

Article 25

Relationship with existing international conventions

1. This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of international conventions to which one or more Member States are parties at the time when this Regulation is adopted and which lay down conflict-of-law rules relating to contractual obligations.

2. However, this Regulation shall, as between Member States, take precedence over conventions concluded exclusively between two or more of them in so far as such conventions concern matters governed by this Regulation.

Article 26

List of Conventions

1. By 17 June 2009, Member States shall notify the Commission of the conventions referred to in Article 25(1). After that date, Member States shall notify the Commission of all denunciations of such conventions.

2. Within six months of receipt of the notifications referred to in paragraph 1, the Commission shall publish in the Official Journal of the European Union:

(a) a list of the conventions referred to in paragraph 1;

(b) the denunciations referred to in paragraph 1.

Article 27

Review clause

1. By 17 June 2013, the Commission shall submit to the European Parliament, the Council and the European Economic and Social Committee a report on the application of this Regulation. If appropriate, the report shall be accompanied by proposals to amend this Regulation. The report shall include:

(a) a study on the law applicable to insurance contracts and an assessment of the impact of the provisions to be introduced, if any; and

(b) an evaluation on the application of Article 6, in particular as regards the coherence of Community law in the field of consumer protection.

2. By 17 June 2010, the Commission shall submit to the European Parliament, the Council and the European Economic and Social Committee a report on the question of the effectiveness of an assignment or subrogation of a claim against third parties and the priority of the assigned or subrogated claim over a right of another person. The report shall be accompanied, if appropriate, by a proposal to amend this Regulation and an assessment of the impact of the provisions to be introduced.

Article 28

Application in time

This Regulation shall apply to contracts concluded after 17 December 2009.

Proposal for a Regulation of the European Parliament and the Council on the law applicable to contractual obligations (Rome I)

[pic] ¦ COMMISSION OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES ¦

Brussels, 15.12.2005

COM(2005) 650 final

2005/0261 (COD)

Proposal for a

REGULATION OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL

on the law applicable to contractual obligations (Rome I)

(presented by the Commission)

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM

1. CONTEXT OF THE PROPOSAL

1.1. Background and objective

The Brussels Convention of 1968 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters contains options enabling a claimant to choose between specified courts, which generates the risk that a party will choose the courts in one Member State rather than another simply because the law is more favourable to his cause. To reduce the risk, the Member States, acting on the same legal basis, signed in 1980 the Rome Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations.

The Amsterdam Treaty gave a new impetus to private international law of Community origin. That was the legal basis on which the Community adopted what is known as the Brussels I Regulation[1] to replace the Brussels Convention of 1968 in relations between Member States. On 22 July 2003 the Commission presented a proposal for a Regulation on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II).[2] The Rome Convention is now the only Community private international law instrument that remains in international treaty form. The drawbacks that this represents are all the less acceptable as Brussels I, Rome II and the Rome Convention of 1980 form an indissoluble set of Community rules of private international law relating to contractual and non-contractual obligations civil and commercial matters.

1.2. Grounds for the proposal

The importance of compatibility between conflict-of-laws rules for achieving the objective of mutual recognition of judicial decisions was acknowledged in the Vienna Action Plan.[3] The 2000 Mutual Recognition Programme[4] sets forth measures to harmonise the conflict-of-laws rules as accompanying measures to facilitate the implementation of the mutual recognition principle. More recently, in the Hague Programme, the European Council[5] restated that work on the conflict-of-laws rules regarding contractual obligations (Rome I) should be actively pursued. The Council and Commission action plan to give effect to that programme provides for a Rome I proposal to be adopted by 2005.[6]

2. OUTCOME OF CONSULTATIONS OF INTERESTED PARTIES AND OTHER INSTITUTIONS - IMPACT ANALYSIS

This proposal has been preceded by extensive consultation of the Member States, the other institutions and civil society, in particular via the Green Paper of 14 January 2003[7] and the public hearing on it in Brussels on 7 January 2004. The 80 or so replies to the Green Paper,[8] received from governments, universities, the legal professions and a variety of economic actors, confirmed that the Rome Convention is not only a widely-known instrument but also highly appreciated in relevant circles, who by a large majority supported its conversion into a Community Regulation while also confirming the need to modernise certain of its rules. On 4 and 5 November 1999 the Commission also organised a public hearing on Electronic Commerce: jurisdiction and applicable law, receiving about 75 written contributions.

In their Opinions dated 29 January[9] and 12 February 2004[10] respectively, the European Economic and Social Committee and the European Parliament came out in favour of converting the Convention into a Community Regulation and modernising it.

On 17 February 2005, the Member States' experts met to consider a preliminary draft Rome I Regulation prepared in the Commission.

Given the limited impact of this proposal on the existing body of legislation and the relevant circles, the Commission has decided to refrain from making a formal impact assessment. The proposal does not set out to establish a new set of legal rules but to convert an existing convention into a Community instrument. But some of the amendments made will help to modernise certain provisions of the Rome Convention and make them clearer and more precise, thus boosting certainty as to the law without bringing in new elements such as would substantially change the existing legal situation. All the changes proposed here are based on the results of the Commission's extensive consultations, which were widely accessible to the public. For further details of the nature and impact of the changes, see the specific commentaries on the individual articles (point 4.2 below).

3. LEGAL ASPECTS OF THE PROPOSAL

3.1. Legal basis

Since the Amsterdam Treaty entered into force, the conflict-of-laws rules have come under Article 61(c) of the TEC. Under Article 67 of the TEC, as amended by the Treaty of Nice, the Regulation is to be adopted by the codecision procedure of Article 251 of the TEC. Article 65(b) provides: Measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters having cross-border implications, to be taken in accordance with Article 67 and in so far as necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market, shall include:... promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws and of jurisdiction. The Community legislature thus has some room for manoeuvre in deciding whether a measure is necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market. Harmonisation of the conflict-of-laws rules relating to contractual obligations is necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market.

Title IV of the TEC, which is the basis for the matters covered by this proposal, does not apply to Denmark by reason of the Protocol applicable to it. Nor does it apply to Ireland and the United Kingdom, unless those countries exercise their right to opt into this initiative as provided by the Protocol annexed to the Treaty.

3.2. Principles of subsidiarity and proportionality

The objective of the proposal - the adoption of uniform rules on the law applicable to contractual obligations to make judicial decisions more easily foreseeable - cannot be adequately attained by the Member States, who cannot lay down uniform Community rules, and can therefore, by reason of its effects throughout the Community, be better achieved at Community level, the Community can take measures, in accordance with the subsidiarity principle set out in Article 5 of the Treaty. And the measures respect the proportionality principle set out in that Article, by increasing certainty in the law without requiring harmonisation of the substantive rules of domestic law.

Point 6 of the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality provides that Other things being equal, directives should be preferred to regulations... For this proposal, however, the Regulation would seem to be preferable as its provisions lay down uniform rules on the applicable law that are detailed, precise and unconditional and require no measures for their transposal into domestic law. If the Member States enjoyed some room for manoeuvre in transposing, the uncertainty as to the law which the aim is to abolish would be restored.

4. ARTICLE-BY-ARTICLE COMMENTARY

4.1. Adaptations linked to the nature of the instrument

Apart from the changes of substance (point 4.2), the obvious differences between the legal nature of the Rome Convention (the Convention) and the Regulation warrant a number of adaptations: apart from the purely formal adaptations, there are those that allowed contracting States to enter reservations (article 22), to adopt new conflict rules after a notification procedure (article 23) or the limited duration of the Convention (article 30). Likewise the two Protocols annexed to the Convention concerning interpretation by the Court of Justice are now superfluous.

4.2. Adaptations to modernise the Rome Convention rules

Given the similarity between the Convention and the proposed Regulation, only changes of substance from the Convention are considered here.

Article 1 - Scope

The proposed changes seek to align the scope of the future Rome I instrument on that of the Brussels I Regulation and to reflect the work done by the Council and the European Parliament on the proposed Rome II Regulation. Point (e) confirms the exclusion of arbitration agreements and agreements on the choice of court as the majority of the replies to the Green Paper felt that the former was already covered by satisfactory international regulations and that the question of the law applicable to the choice-of-forum clause should ultimately be settled by the Brussels I Regulation. Point (f) combines the rules of point (e) and the company-law aspects of point (f) of the Convention. The first sentence of point (f) of the Convention has been deleted as there is a specific rule on agency (Article 7). Point (i) proposes a specific rule for pre-contractual obligations which, according to the contributions, confirms the analysis of the majority of legal systems in the Union and the restrictive concept of the contract adopted by the Court of Justice in its judgments concerning Article 5(1) of the Brussels I Regulation: for the purposes of private international law, they would be treated as a matter of tort/delict and governed by the future Rome II instrument.

Article 2 - Application of law of non-member States

The discussions of the Rome II draft revealed that the title of Article 2 of the Convention (Universal application) was a source of confusion: it has therefore been changed for the sake of clarity.

The proposed changes to the second and third subparagraphs of paragraph 1 require the courts to ascertain the true tacit will of the parties rather than a purely hypothetical will: they suggest that the parties' conduct be taken into account and seek to clarify the impact of the choice of court, so as to reinforce the foreseeability of the law.

To further boost the impact of the parties' will, a key principle of the Convention, paragraph 2 authorises the parties to choose as the applicable law a non-State body of law. The form of words used would authorise the choice of the UNIDROIT principles, the Principles of European Contract Law or a possible future optional Community instrument, while excluding the lex mercatoria , which is not precise enough, or private codifications not adequately recognised by the international community. Like Article 7(2) of the Vienna Convention on the international sale of goods, the text shows what action should be taken when certain aspects of the law of contract are not expressly settled by the relevant body of non-State law.

Paragraph 4 addresses the issue of fraudulent evasion of the law, referring not only to binding international provisions within the meaning of Article 8 but also the mandatory provisions in the domestic law of a legal system. Paragraph 5 aims to prevent fraudulent evasion of Community law.

Article 4 -Applicable law in the absence of choice

The rule in the Convention, whereby the applicable law is the law of the place where the party performing the service characterising the contract has his habitual residence, is preserved, but the proposed changes seek to enhance certainty as to the law by converting mere presumptions into fixed rules and abolishing the exception clause. Since the cornerstone of the instrument is freedom of choice, the rules applicable in the absence of a choice should be as precise and foreseeable as possible so that the parties can decide whether or not to exercise their choice.

Regarding the solutions for the different categories of contracts, only those proposed at points (g) and (h) have come up for discussion and prompted court decisions in the Member States in relation to determination of the characteristic performance. The solutions are based on the fact that Community law seeks to protect the franchisee and the distributor as the weaker parties.

Paragraph 2 retains the characteristic performance criterion for contracts for which paragraph 1 lays down no special rule, such as complex contracts that are not easy to categorise or contracts involving mutual performance by the parties in terms that can be regarded as characteristic on both sides.

Article 5 - Consumer contracts

Paragraph 1 proposes a new, simple and foreseeable conflict rule consisting of applying only the law of the place of the consumer's habitual residence, without affecting the substance of the professional's room for manoeuvre in drawing up his contracts. The solution adopted in the Convention was widely criticised in the responses to the Green Paper as it often produced hybrid solutions in which the law applicable to the professional and the mandatory provisions of the law applicable to the consumer were applied in parallel. In the event of a dispute, this complex solution entails additional procedural costs that are all the less justified as the consumer's claim will tend to be quite small. There are two possible solutions to prevent this hybrid situation - full application of the law applicable to the professional or the law applicable to the consumer - only the latter would be truly compatible with the high level of protection for the consumer demanded by the Treaty. It also seems fair in economic terms: a consumer will make cross-border purchases only occasionally whereas most traders operating across borders will be able to spread the cost of learning about one or more legal systems over a large range of transactions. Finally, in practice this solution does not substantially modify the situation of the professional, for whom the initial difficulty in drafting standard contracts is to comply with the mandatory provisions of the law in the country of consumption; under the Convention, the mandatory provisions are already those of the country of the consumer's habitual residence. Regarding other clauses, which the parties are free to draft as they wish, the freedom of the parties to draft their own contract is the rule that continues to prevail; it therefore matters little whether they are governed by the law of one or other party.

Paragraph 2 specifies the conditions for applying the special rule. The first subparagraph now recalls that the consumer's contracting partner, a concept defined in some detail by the Court of Justice, is a professional. As requested in the great majority of contributions in response to the Green Paper, the second subparagraph replaces the conditions of Article 5(2) and (4)(b) of the Convention by the targeted activity criterion, already present in Article 15 of the Brussels I Regulation to take account of developments in distance selling techniques without substantially changing the scope of the special rule. When the Brussels I Regulation was adopted, a joint declaration by the Council and the Commission[11] specified that, for the consumer protection provisions to be applicable, it was not enough for a firm to target its activities on the Member State where the consumer was domiciled a contract must also have been concluded in the exercise of his trade or profession. The mere fact that an Internet site is accessible is not sufficient for Article 15 to be applicable, although a factor will be that this Internet site solicits the conclusion of distance contracts and that a contract has actually been concluded at a distance, by whatever means. In this respect, the language or currency which a website uses does not constitute a relevant factor. The sites to which this declaration refers are not necessarily interactive sites: a site inviting buyers to fax an order aims to conclude distance contracts. On the other hand, a site which offers information to potential consumers all over the world but refers them to local distributor or agent for the purposes of concluding the actual contract does not aim to conclude distance contracts. Unlike Article 5(2) of the Convention, the proposed Regulation does not require the consumer to have done the acts needed to conclude the contract in the country of his habitual residence, as this is a superfluous condition in terms of contracts concluded via the Internet. On the other hand, the last subparagraph of this paragraph brings in a safeguard clause to protect the professional, for example where he has agreed to enter into a contract with a consumer who has lied about his habitual residence; for a contract concluded via the Internet, it will up to the professional to ensure that his standard form makes it possible to identify where the consumer lives.

The proposed Regulation no longer contains a list of contracts to which the special rule applies; its material scope is accordingly extended to all contracts with consumers except those expressly excluded by paragraph 3.

Article 6 - Individual employment contracts

The basic rule in paragraph 2(a) has been amplified and the reference is now to the country in or from which... to take account of the law as stated by the Court of Justice in relation to Article 18 of the Brussels I Regulation and its broad interpretation of the habitual place of work. This change will make it possible to apply the rule to personnel working on board aircraft, if there is a fixed base from which work is organised and where the personnel perform other obligations in relation to the employer (registration, safety checks). Paragraph 2(b) will thus apply more rarely. The text then provides additional guidance as to whether an employee posted abroad is temporarily employed there, though there is no rigid definition. The courts are to have regard to the intentions of the parties.

Article 7 - Contracts concluded by an agent

Among the three legal relationships that arise from a contract concluded by an agent - between principal and agent, between agent and third party and between principal and third party - only the first two are covered by the Convention. The question of the agent's powers is excluded by Article 1(2)(f); the reasons for the exclusion are the diversity of the national conflict rules when the Convention was negotiated and the existence of the Hague Convention of 14 March 1978 on the law applicable to agency. As only three Member States have signed and/or ratified the Convention and national solutions have come closer into line with each other, the exclusion is no longer warranted. The proposed Regulation brings together in a single Article all the rules governing legal relationship arising from agency contracts.

Article 8 - Mandatory provisions

Paragraph 1 proposes a definition of international mandatory provisions for the purposes of Article 8 which is inspired by the Court of Justice's judgment in Arblade.[12] Paragraph 31 of that judgment holds that the fact that national rules are categorised as mandatory provisions legislation does not mean that they are exempt from compliance with the provisions of the Treaty: the considerations underlying such national legislation can be taken into account by Community law only in terms of the exceptions to Community freedoms expressly provided for by the Treaty. Paragraph 3 specifies the criteria that may be used by the courts to decide whether it should apply the mandatory provisions of another Member State. The replies to the Green Paper having enabled decisions referring to the concept of foreign mandatory provisions, including those of the Member States that had entered reservations on Article 7(1) of the Convention, to be identified, the utility of the rule would seem to be confirmed, especially as the Brussels I Regulation sometimes provides for alternative grounds of jurisdiction; it is therefore essential in a genuine European justice area for the courts to be able to have regard to another Member State's mandatory provisions where there is a close connection with the case and where a court action has already been brought by the claimant.

Article 10 - Formal validity

Given the growing frequency of distance contracts, the rules in the Convention governing formal validity of contracts are now clearly too restrictive. To facilitate the formal validity of contracts or unilateral acts, further alternative connecting factors are introduced. The specific rules for contracts concluded by an agent have been incorporated in paragraphs 1 and 2.

Article 13 - Voluntary assignment and contractual subrogation

Voluntary assignment and contractual subrogation perform a similar economic function and are now covered by a single Article. Paragraph 3 introduces a new conflict rule relating to the possibility of pleading an assignment of a claim against a third party; the solution is the one recommended by the great majority of respondents, which was also adopted in the 2001 UNCITRAL Convention on the assignment of receivables in international trade.

Article 14 - Statutory subrogation

Voluntary subrogation is now covered by Article 13, so Article 14 applies solely to statutory subrogation as provided, for instance, where an insurer who has compensated a person who has suffered a loss is subrogated to the victim's rights against the person who caused the loss. The amendment reflects the work done by the Council and the European Parliament on the Rome II proposal to explain this mechanism, unknown in certain legal systems, in terms that are easier to understand.

Article 15 - Multiple debtors

The amendment reflects the same work so as to cover subrogation and multiple debtors by two separate provisions and present the conflict rules relating to multiple debtors in simpler terms. The final sentence clarifies the situation of a debtor enjoying special protection.

Article 16 - Statutory offsetting

The contributions confirmed the analysis in the Green Paper regarding the usefulness of a rule governing statutory offsetting, given that contractual offsetting is by definition subject to the general rules in Articles 3 and 4. The aim of the solution adopted here is to make offsetting easier while respecting the legitimate concerns of the person who did not take the initiative.

Article 18 - Assimilation to habitual residence

Like the Rome II proposal, Article 18 contains a definition of habitual residence, in particular for legal persons.

Article 21 - States with more than one legal system

Where a State consists of several territorial units each with its own substantive law of contractual obligations, this Regulation must also apply to conflicts of laws between those territorial units so as to ensure foreseeability and certainty on the law and the uniform application of European rules to all conflict situations.

Article 22 - Relationship with other provisions of Community law

Like Article 20 of the Convention, Article 22 determines the relationship with other provisions of Community law. Point a) covers the conflict-of-laws rules in instruments of Community secondary legislation in the specific subject-areas listed in Annex 1. The purpose of point b) is to secure consistency with a possible optional instrument in the context of the European Contract Law project. The relationship between the proposed Regulation and the rules to promote the smooth operation of the internal market is governed by point c).

Article 23 - Relationship with existing international conventions

The purpose of the proposed amendments is to strike a balance between compliance with the Member States' international commitments and the objective of establishing a genuine European judicial area while enhancing the transparency of the body of law in force by publishing the conventions to which the Member States are Parties. Paragraph 2 sets out the basic rule that international conventions take precedence over the proposed Regulation. But there is an exception where at the time of conclusion of the contract all material aspects of the situation are located in one or more Member States. The co-existence of two parallel schemes - application of conventions rules for Member States which have ratified and application of the proposed regulation elsewhere - would be contrary to the smooth operation of the internal market. Paragraph 3 specifically refers to bilateral conventions concluded between the new Member States.

2005/0261 (COD)

Proposal for a

REGULATION OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL

on the law applicable to contractual obligations (Rome I)

THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION,

Having regard to the Treaty establishing the European Community, and in particular Articles 61(c) and the second indent of Article 67(5) thereof,

Having regard to the proposal from the Commission[13],

Having regard to the Opinion of the European Economic and Social Committee[14],

Acting in accordance with the procedure provided for by Article 251 of the Treaty[15],

Whereas:

(1) The Union has set itself the objective of establishing an area of freedom, security and justice. To that end the Community must adopt measures relating to judicial cooperation in civil matters with a cross-border impact to the extent necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market, including measures promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws.

(2) For the purposes of effectively implementing the relevant provisions of the Amsterdam Treaty, the Council (Justice and Home Affairs) on 3 December 1998 adopted a plan of action on how best to implement the provisions of the Treaty of Amsterdam on an area of freedom, security and justice,[16] stressing the importance of promoting the compatibility of conflict-of-law rules in order to attain the objective of mutual recognition of judgments and calling for the revision, where necessary, of certain provisions of the Convention on the Law applicable to contractual obligations, taking into account special provisions on conflict-of-law rules in other Community instruments.

(3) The Tampere European Council on 15 and 16 October 1999 approved the principle of mutual recognition of judgments as a priority matter in the establishment of a European judicial- area. The programme of measures for implementation of the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in civil and commercial matters[17] specifies that the accompanying measures relating to harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules actually do help facilitate the mutual recognition of judgments. In the Hague Programme,[18] the European Council restated that work on the conflict of laws regarding contractual obligations should be actively pursued.

(4) The proper functioning of the internal market creates a need, in order to improve the predictability of the outcome of litigation, certainty as to the law and the free movement of judgments, for the rules of conflict of laws in the Member States to designate the same national law irrespective of the country of the court in which an action is brought. For the same reasons there is a need to achieve the greatest harmony between three instruments - this Regulation, Council Regulation (EC) No 2001/44 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (Brussels I)[19] and Parliament and Council Regulation (EC) No [...] on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II).

(5) The concern for transparency in Community legislation is such that the largest possible number of conflict-of-laws rules should be brought together in a single instrument or at least that this Regulation should contain a list of special rules laid down by sectoral instruments.

(6) The scope of the Regulation must be determined in such a way as to be consistent with Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 and Parliament and Council Regulation (EC) No [...] on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II).

(7) Freedom for the parties to choose the applicable law must be one of the cornerstone of the system of conflict-of-laws rules in matters of contractual obligations.

(8) To contribute to the general objective of the instrument - certainty as to the law in the European judicial area - the conflict rules must be highly foreseeable. But the courts must retain a degree of discretion to determine the law that is most closely connected to the situation in a limited number of hypothetical cases.

(9) As regards contracts concluded with parties regarded as being weaker, those parties should be protected by conflict rules that are more favourable to their interests than the general rules.

(10) With more specific reference to consumer contracts, the conflict rule must make it possible to cut the cost of settling disputes on what are commonly relatively small claims and to take account of the development of distance-selling techniques. Harmony with Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 requires both that there be a reference to the concept of targeted activity as a condition for applying the consumer-protection rule and that the concept be interpreted harmoniously in the two instruments, bearing in mind that a joint declaration by the Council and the Commission on Article 15 of Regulation No 44/2001[20] states that for Article 15(1)(c) to be applicable it is not sufficient for an undertaking to target its activities at the Member State of the consumer's residence, or at a number of Member States including that Member State; a contract must also be concluded within the framework of its activities. The declaration also states that the mere fact that an Internet site is accessible is not sufficient for Article 15 to be applicable, although a factor will be that this Internet site solicits the conclusion of distance contracts and that a contract has actually been concluded at a distance, by whatever means. In this respect, the language or currency which a website uses does not constitute a relevant factor.

(11) Regarding individual employment contracts, the conflict rule should make it possible to identify the centre of gravity of the employment relationship, looking beyond appearances. This rule does not prejudge the application of the mandatory rules of the country to which a worker is posted in accordance with Directive 96/71/EC of 16 December 1996 concerning the posting of workers in the framework of the provision of services.[21]

(12) Regarding contracts concluded by agents, conflict rules should be laid down to govern the three legal relationships between the principal, the agent and the third party. A contract concluded between the principal and the third party would remain subject to the general rules of this Regulation.

(13) Respect for the public policy (ordre public) of the Member States requires specific rules concerning mandatory rules and the exception on grounds of public policy. Such rules must be applied in a manner compatible with the Treaty.

(14) For the sake of certainty as to the law there should be a clear definition of habitual residence, in particular for bodies corporate. Unlike Article 60(1)(c) of Regulation (EC) No 44/2001, which establishes three criteria, the conflict-of-laws rule should proceed on the basis of a single criterion; otherwise, it would remain impossible for parties to foresee the law applicable to their situation.

(15) The relationship between this Regulation and certain other provisions of Community law should be spelled out.

(16) Respect for international commitments entered into by the Member States means that this Regulation should not affect conventions relating to specific matters to which the Member States are parties. However, where at the time of conclusion of the contract material aspects of the situation are located in one or more Member States, the application of certain international conventions to which only some of the Member States are Parties would be contrary to the objective of a genuine European judicial area. The rule set out in this Regulation should accordingly be applied. To make the rules easier to read, the Commission will publish the list of the relevant conventions in the Official Journal of the European Union on the basis of information supplied by the Member States.

(17) Since the objective of the proposed action, namely better foreseeability of court judgments requiring genuinely uniform rules on the law applicable to contractual obligations determined by a mandatory and directly applicable Community legal instrument, cannot be adequately attained by the Member States, who cannot lay down uniform Community rules, and can therefore, by reason of its effects throughout the Community, be better achieved at Community level, the Community can take measures, in accordance with the subsidiarity principle set out in Article 5 of the Treaty. In accordance with the proportionality principle set out in that Article, a Regulation, which increases certainty in the law without requiring harmonisation of the substantive rules of domestic law, does not go beyond what is necessary to attain that objective.

(18) [In accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, these Member States have stated their intention of participating in the adoption and application of this Regulation. / In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, these Member States are not participating in the adoption of this Regulation, which will accordingly not be binding on those Member States.]

(19) In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, that Member State is not participating in the adoption of this Regulation, which will accordingly not be binding on that Member State,

HAVE ADOPTED THIS REGULATION:

Chap ter One - Scope

Article 1 - Scope

1. This Regulation shall apply, in any situation involving a conflict of laws, to contractual obligations in civil and commercial matters.

It shall not extend, in particular, to revenue, customs or administrative matters.

2. The Regulation shall not apply to:

(a) questions involving the status or legal capacity of natural persons, without prejudice to Article 12;

(b) contractual obligations relating to a family relationship or a relationship which, in accordance with the law applicable to it, has similar effects, including maintenance obligations;

(c) obligations arising out a matrimonial relationship or a property ownership scheme which, under the law applicable to it, has similar effects to a marriage, wills and successions;

(d) obligations arising under bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments to the extent that the obligations under such other negotiable instruments arise out of their negotiable character;

(e) arbitration agreements and agreements on the choice of court;

(f) questions governed by the law of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate such as the creation, by registration or otherwise, legal capacity, internal organisation or winding up of companies and other bodies corporate or unincorporate, the personal liability of officers and members as such for the obligations of the company or body and the question whether a management body of a company or other body corporate or unincorporated can bind the company or body in relation to third parties;

(g) the constitution of trusts and the relationship between settlers, trustees and beneficiaries;

(h) evidence and procedure, without prejudice to Article 17;

(i) obligations arising out of a pre-contractual relationship.

3. In this Regulation, the term Member State shall mean Member States with the exception of Denmark [,Ireland and the United Kingdom].

Article 2 - Application of law of non-member States

Any law specified by this Convention shall be applied whether or not it is the law of a Member State.

Chap ter II -Uniform rules

Article 3 - Freedom of choice

1. Without prejudice to Articles 5, 6 and 7, a contract shall be governed by the law chosen by the parties.

The choice must be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the terms of the contract behaviour of the parties or the circumstances of the case. If the parties have agreed to confer jurisdiction on one or more courts or tribunals of a Member State to hear and determine disputes that have arisen or may arise out of the contract, they shall also be presumed to have chosen the law of that Member State.

By their choice the parties can select the law applicable to the whole or a part only of the contract.

2. The parties may also choose as the applicable law the principles and rules of the substantive law of contract recognised internationally or in the Community.

However, questions relating to matters governed by such principles or rules which are not expressly settled by them shall be governed by the general principles underlying them or, failing such principles, in accordance with the law applicable in the absence of a choice under this Regulation.

3. The parties may at any time agree to subject the contract to a law other than that which previously governed it, whether as a result of an earlier choice under this Article or of other provisions of this Regulation. Any change in the law to be applied that is made after the conclusion of the contract shall not prejudice its formal validity under Article 10 or adversely affect the rights of third parties.

4. The fact that the parties have chosen a foreign law in accordance with paragraphs 1 or 2, whether or not accompanied by the choice of a foreign tribunal, shall not, where all the other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are connected with one country only, prejudice the application of rules of the law of that country which cannot be derogated from by contract, hereinafter called mandatory rules.

5. Where the parties choose the law of a non-member State, that choice shall be without prejudice to the application of such mandatory rules of Community law as are applicable to the case.

6. The existence and validity of the consent of the parties as to the choice of the applicable law shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of Articles 9, 10 and 12.

Article 4 - Applicable law in the absence of choice

1. To the extent that the law applicable to the contract has not been chosen in accordance with Article 3, the contract shall be governed by the law determined as follows:

(a) a contract of sale shall be governed by the law of the country in which the seller has his habitual residence;

(b) a contract for the provision of services shall be governed by the law of the country in which the service provider has his habitual residence;

(c) a contract of carriage shall be governed by the law of the country in which the carrier has his habitual residence;

(d) a contract relating to a right in rem or right of user in immovable property shall be governed by the law of the country in which the property is situated;

(e) notwithstanding point (d), a lease for the temporary personal use of immovable property for a period of no more than six consecutive months shall be governed by the law of the country in which the owner has his habitual residence, provided the tenant is a natural person and has his habitual residence in the same country;

(f) a contract relating to intellectual or industrial property rights shall be governed by the law of the country in which the person who transfers or assigns the rights has his habitual residence;

(g) a franchise contract shall be governed by the law of the country in which the franchised person has his habitual residence;

(h) a distribution contract shall be governed by the law of the country in which the distributor has his habitual residence.

2. Contracts not specified in paragraph 1 shall be governed by the law of the country in which the party who is required to perform the service characterising the contract has his habitual residence at the time of the conclusion of the contract. Where that service cannot be identified, the contract shall be governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected.

Article 5 - Consumer contracts

1. Consumer contracts within the meaning and in the conditions provided for by paragraph 2 shall be governed by the law of the Member State in which the consumer has his habitual residence.

2. Paragraph 1 shall apply to contracts concluded by a natural person, the consumer, who has his habitual residence in a Member State for a purpose which can be regarded as being outside his trade or profession with another person, the professional, acting in the exercise of his trade or profession.

It shall apply on condition that the contract has been concluded with a person who pursues a trade or profession in the Member State in which the consumer has his habitual residence or, by any means, directs such activities to that Member State or to several States including that Member State, and the contract falls within the scope of such activities, unless the professional did not know where the consumer had his habitual residence and this ignorance was not attributable to his negligence.

3. Paragraph 1 shall not apply to:

1. a contract for the supply of services where the services are to be supplied to the consumer exclusively in a country other than that in which he has his habitual residence;

2. contracts of carriage other than contracts relating to package travel within the meaning of Directive 90/314/EEC of 13 June 1990;

3. contracts relating to a right in rem or right of user in immovable property other than contracts relating to a right of user on a timeshare basis within the meaning of Directive 94/47/EC of 26 October 1994.

Article 6 - Individual employment contracts

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 3, in a contract of employment a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the employee of the protection afforded him by the mandatory rules of the law which would be applicable under this Article in the absence of choice.

2. A contract of employment shall, in the absence of choice in accordance with Article 3, be governed:

4. by the law of the country in or from which the employee habitually carries out his work in performance of the contract. The place of performance shall not be deemed to have changed if he is temporarily employed in another country. Work carried out in another country shall be regarded as temporary if the employee is expected to resume working in the country of origin after carrying out his tasks abroad. The conclusion of a new contract of employment with the original employer or an employer belonging to the same group of companies as the original employer does not preclude the employee from being regarded as carrying out his work in another country temporarily;

5. if the employee does not habitually carry out his work in or from any one country, or he habitually carries out his work in or from a territory subject to no national sovereignty, by the law of the country in which the place of business through which he was engaged is situated.

3. The law designated by paragraph 2 may be excluded where it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country, in which case the contract shall be governed by the law of that country.

Article 7 - Contracts concluded by an agent

1. In the absence of a choice under Article 3, a contract between principal and agent shall be governed by the law of the country in which the agent has his habitual residence, unless the agent exercises or is to exercise his main activity in the country in which the principal has his habitual residence, in which case the law of that country shall apply.

2. The relationship between the principal and third parties arising out of the fact that the agent has acted in the exercise of his powers, in excess of his powers or without power, shall be governed by the law of the country in which the agent had his habitual residence when he acted. However, the applicable law shall be the law of the country in which the agent acted if either the principal on whose behalf he acted or the third party has his habitual residence in that country or the agent acted at an exchange or auction.

3. Notwithstanding paragraph 2, where the law applicable to a relationship covered by that paragraph has been designated in writing by the principal or the agent and expressly accepted by the other party, the law thus designated shall be applicable to these matters.

4. The law designated by paragraph 2 shall also govern the relationship between the agent and the third party arising from the fact that the agent has acted in the exercise of his powers, in excess of his powers or without power.

Article 8 - Mandatory rules

1. Mandatory rules are rules the respect for which is regarded as crucial by a country for safeguarding its political, social or economic organisation to such an extent that they are applicable to any situation falling within their scope, irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the contract under this Regulation.

2. Nothing in this Regulation shall restrict the application of the rules of the law of the forum in a situation where they are mandatory.

3. Effect may be given to the mandatory rules of the law of another country with which the situation has a close connection. In considering whether to give effect to these mandatory rules, courts shall have regard to their nature and purpose in accordance with the definition in paragraph 1 and to the consequences of their application or non-application for the objective pursued by the relevant mandatory rules and for the parties.

Article 9 - Consent and material validity

1. The existence and validity of a contract, or of any term of a contract, shall be determined by the law which would govern it under this Regulation if the contract or term were valid.

2. Nevertheless a party may rely upon the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence to establish that he did not consent if it appears from the circumstances that it would not be reasonable to determine the effect of his conduct in accordance with the law specified in the preceding paragraph.

Article 10 - Formal validity

1. A contract is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs it in substance under this Regulation or the law of the country in which one or other of the parties or his agent is when it is concluded or the law of the country in which one or other of the parties has his habitual residence at that time.

2. A unilateral act intended to have legal effect relating to an existing or contemplated contract is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs or would govern the contract in substance under this Regulation or of the law of the country in which the act is performed or the law of the country in which the person who drafted it has his habitual residence at that time.

3. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article shall not apply to contracts that fall within the scope of Article 5. The form of such contracts shall be governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence.

4. Notwithstanding paragraphs 1 to 3 of this Article, a contract the subject matter of which is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property shall be subject to the mandatory requirements of form of the law of the country where the property is situated if by that law those requirements are mandatory provisions within the meaning of Article 8.

Article 11 - Scope of applicable law

1. The law applicable to a contract by virtue of this Regulation shall govern in particular:

6. interpretation;

7. performance;

8. within the limits of the powers conferred on the court by its procedural law, the consequences of the total or partial breach of obligations, including the assessment of damages in so far as it is governed by rules of law;

9. the various ways of extinguishing obligations, and prescription and limitation of actions;

10. the consequences of nullity of the contract.

2. In relation to the manner of performance and the steps to be taken in the event of defective performance regard shall be had to the law of the country in which performance takes place.

Article 12 - Incapacity

In a contract concluded between persons who are in the same country, a natural person who would have capacity under the law of that country may invoke his incapacity resulting from another law only if the other party to the contract was aware of this incapacity at the time of the conclusion of the contract or was not aware thereof as a result of negligence.

Article 13 - Voluntary assignment and contractual subrogation

1. The mutual obligations of assignor and assignee under a voluntary assignment or contractual subrogation of a right against another person shall be governed by the law which under this Regulation applies to the contract between the assignor and assignee.

2. The law governing the original contract shall determine the effectiveness of contractual limitations on assignment as between the assignee and the debtor, the relationship between the assignee and the debtor, the conditions under which the assignment can be invoked against the debtor and whether the debtor's obligations have been discharged.

3. The question whether the assignment or subrogation may be relied on against third parties shall be governed by the law of the country in which the assignor or the author of the subrogation has his habitual residence at the material time.

Article 14 - Statutory subrogation

Where a person has a contractual claim upon another and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether the third person is entitled to proceed against the debtor.

Article 15 - Multiple liability

Where a creditor has a claim upon several debtors who are jointly liable and one of those debtors has in fact satisfied the creditor, the law of the obligation of this debtor towards the creditor governs the right of this debtor to claim against the other debtors. Where the law applicable to a debtor's obligation to the creditor provides for rules to protect him against actions to ascertain his liability, he may also rely on them against other debtors.

Article 16 - Statutory offsetting

1. Statutory offsetting shall be governed by the law applicable to the obligation in relation to which the right to offset is asserted.

Article 17 - Burden of proof

1. The law governing the contract under this Regulation shall apply to the extent that it contains, in the law of contract, rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. A contract or an act intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognized by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 10 under which that contract or act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

Chapter III - Other provisions

Article 18 - Assimilation to habitual residence

1. For companies or firms and other bodies or incorporate or unincorporate, the principal establishment shall be considered to be the habitual residence for the purposes of this Regulation.

Where the contract is concluded in the course of operation of a subsidiary, a branch or any other establishment, or if, under the contract, performance is the responsibility of such an establishment, this establishment shall be considered the habitual residence.

2. For the purposes of this Regulation, where the contract is concluded in the course of the business activity of a natural person, that natural person's establishment shall be considered the habitual residence.

Article 19 - Exclusion of renvoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Regulation means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law.

Article 20 - Ordre public

The application of a rule of the law of any country specified by this Regulation may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy (ordre public) of the forum.

Article 21 - States with more than one legal system

Where a State comprises several territorial units each of which has its own rules of law in respect of contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Regulation.

Article 22 - Relationship with other provisions of Community law

This Regulation shall not prejudice the application or adoption of acts of the institutions of the European Communities which:

11. in relation to particular matters, lay down choice-of-law rules relating to contractual obligations; a list of such acts currently in force is provided in Annex 1; or

12. govern contractual obligations and which, by virtue of the will of the parties, apply in conflict-of-law situations; or

13. lay down rules to promote the smooth operation of the internal market, where such rules cannot apply at the same time as the law designated by the rules of private international law.

Article 23 - Relationship with existing international conventions

1. The Member States shall notify the Commission, no later than six months after the entry into force of this Regulation, of the list of multilateral conventions governing conflicts of laws in specific matters relating to contractual obligations to which they are Parties. The Commission shall publish the list in the Official Journal of the European Union within six months thereafter.

After that date, the Member States shall notify the Commission of all denunciations of such conventions, which the Commission shall publish in the Official Journal of the European Union within six months after receiving them.

2. This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of international conventions referred to in paragraph 1. However, where, at the time of conclusion of the contract, material aspects of the situation are located in one or more Member States, this Regulation shall take precedence over the following Conventions:

- the Hague Convention of 15 June 1955 on the law applicable to international sales of goods;

- the Hague Convention of 14 March 1978 on the law applicable to agency.

3. This Regulation shall take precedence over bilateral international conventions concluded between Member States and listed in Annex II if they concern matters governed by this Regulation.

Chapter IV - Final provisions

Article 24 - Entry into force and application in time

This Regulation shall enter into force on the twentieth day following its publication in the Official Journal of the European Union .

This Regulation shall apply from [one year after entry into force].

It shall apply to contractual obligations arising after its entry into application. However, for contractual obligations arising before its entry into application, this Regulation shall apply where its provisions have the effect of making the same law applicable as would have been applicable under the Rome Convention of 1980.

This Regulation shall be binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States.

GREEN PAPER

on the conversion of the Rome Convention of 1980 on the law applicable to contractual obligations into a Community instrument and its modernisation

(presented by the Commission)

TABLE OF CONTENTS

on the conversion of the Rome Convention of 1980 on the law applicable to contractual obligations into a Community instrument and its modernisation

The purpose of this Green Paper is to launch a wide-ranging consultation of interested parties on a number of legal questions on the conversion of the Rome Convention of 1980 on the law applicable to contractual obligations ("the Rome Convention" or "the Convention") into a Community instrument and its modernisation.

It sets out the general context of the debate and presents a number of options.

The Commission invites interested parties to send reasoned replies to the questions raised in this Green Paper and listed on page 3. The questions are, obviously, not restrictive and more general comments will be appreciated. In addition, for each question interested parties are asked to provide the Commission with whatever information they can on the impact that the various options would have on:

i. business life in general;

ii. small business in particular;

iii. relations between businesses and consumers/workers.

The Commission will take account of comments received in the case it prepares a proposal for a Community instrument.

It must be stressed that the Commission has neither taken a decision in respect of the necessity to modernise the Rome Convention nor in respect of its conversion into a Community instrument.

The present document does not intend to examine the relationship between a possible future instrument and the Internal Market rules. For the Commission it is clear, however, that such an instrument should leave intact the principles of the Internal Market laid down in the Treaty or in secondary legislation.

Interested parties are requested to send their answers and comments before 15 September 2003 to the following address:

European Commission
Directorate-General for Justice and Home Affairs, Unit A3 - Cooperation in Civil Matters
B-1049 Brussels
Fax: + 32 (2) 299,64 57
E-MAIL: jai-coop-jud-civil@cec.eu.int

Interested parties are requested to chose one single means of communication (electronic mail, fax or ordinary mail) to send their contributions. In the absence of formal instructions to the contrary, respondents' answers and comments may be published on the Commission's website.

The Commission plans to organise a public hearing on the subject in the last quarter of 2003.

LIST OF THE QUESTIONS

Question 1: Do you have information concerning economic actors' and legal practitioners' actual knowledge of the Rome Convention of 1980 and of its rules, in particular the rule allowing parties to freely choose the law applicable to their contract? If you consider that such knowledge in sufficient, do you think that this situation has a negative impact on the parties' conduct in their contractual relations or on court proceedings?

Question 2: Do you believe the Rome Convention of 1980 should be converted into a Community instrument? What are your arguments for or against such a conversion?

Question 3: Are you aware of difficulties encountered because of the proliferation and dispersal of rules having an impact on the applicable law in several horizontal and sectoral instruments of secondary legislation? If so, what do you think is the best way of remedying them?

Question 4: Do you think a possible future instrument should contain a general clause guaranteeing the application of a Community minimum standard when all elements, or at least certain highly significant elements, of the contract are located within the Community? Does the wording proposed at 3.1.2.2 allow the objective pursued to be attained?

Question 5: Do you have comments on the guidelines with regard to the relationship between a possible Rome instrument and existing international conventions?

Question 6: Do you think one should envisage conflict rules applicable to arbitration and choice of forum clauses?

Question 7: How do you evaluate the current rules on insurance? Do you think that the current treatment of hypotheses (a) and (c) is satisfactory? How would you recommend resolving the difficulties that have been met (if any)?

Question 8: Should the parties be allowed to directly choose an international convention, or even general principles of law? What are the arguments for or against this solution?

Question 9: Do you think that a future Rome I instrument should contain more precise information regarding the definition of a tacit choice of applicable law or would conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Justice suffice to ensure certainty as to the law?

Question 10: Do you believe that Article 4 should be redrafted to compel the court to begin by applying the presumption of paragraph 2 and to rule out the law thus obtained only if it is obviously unsuited to the instant case? If so, how do you think it would be best drafted?

Question 11: Do you believe one should create a specific rule on short-term holiday tenancy, along the lines of the second subparagraph of Article 22(1) of the Brussels I Regulation, or do you consider the present solution satisfactory?

Question 12: Evaluation of the consumer protection rules:

A. How do you evaluate the current rules on consumer protection? Are they still appropriate, in particular in the light of the development of electronic commerce?

B. Do you have information on the impact of the current rule on a) companies in general; b) small and medium-sized enterprises; c) consumers?

C. Among the proposed solutions, which do you prefer, and why? Are other solutions possible?

D. In your view, what would be the impact of the various possible solutions on a) companies in general; b) small and medium-sized enterprises; c) consumers?

Question 13: Should the future Rome I instrument specify the meaning of "mandatory provisions" in Articles 3, 5, 6 and 9 and in Article 7?

Question 14: Should Article 6 be clarified as regards the definition of "temporary employment"? If so, how?

Question 15: Do you think that Article 6 should be amended on other points?

Question 16: Do you believe there should be rules concerning foreign mandatory rules in the meaning of Article 7? Would it be desirable for the future instrument to be more precise on the conditions for applying such rules?

Question 17: Do you think that the conflict rule on form should be modernised?

Question 18: Do you believe that a future instrument should specify the law applicable to the conditions under which the assignment may be invoked against third parties ? If so, what conflict rule do you recommend?

Question 19: Would it be useful to specify the respective scope of Articles 12 and 13? Do you believe that there should be a conflict rule for subrogation payments made in the absence of an obligation?

Question 20: In your view, would it be useful to specify the law applicable to legal compensation? If so, what conflict rule do you recommend?

Introduction

1.1. The creation of an area of freedom, security and justice

One of the consequences of expanding trade and travel in the world in general and the European Union in particular is the increased risk that European citizens or companies established in a Member State may be involved in a dispute of which all the elements are not confined to the State where they have their habitual residence. An example might be a Greek consumer who bought an electronic instrument in Germany from a catalogue or via the Internet and now wants to sue the manufacturer because it has a serious defect that the manufacturer refuses to repair, or a German company which wants to sue its English trading partner for failure to perform its contract.

Parties are often discouraged from asserting their rights in a foreign country by the incompatibility or complexity of national legal and administrative systems. This applies particularly to private individuals or small businesses, who generally do not have the financial resources to secure the services of an international network of lawyers.

But in the European Union there cannot be a genuine internal market, envisaging free movement of goods, persons, services and capital, without a common law-enforcement area in which all citizens can assert their rights not only in their home country but also in other Member States.

The Tampere European Council on 15 and 16 October 1999[1] set three main lines of priority action for the creation of such an area, one of which is the strengthening of the mutual recognition of court orders and judgments.

Harmonisation of the rules of private international law is essential for attaining this objective.

1.2. The role of private international law in the creation of a European judicial area

Private international law[2] is made up of mechanisms to facilitate the settlement of international disputes. It answers three questions:

– which country's courts have jurisdiction in a dispute; this question refers to the determination of "international jurisdiction" or "conflicts of jurisdiction";

– which country's substantive law is to be applied by the court hearing the case; the problem of applicable law goes by the name of "conflict of laws";

– can the decision given by the court which declared that it had jurisdiction be recognised and, if necessary, enforced in another Member State; this question, designated by the expressions "effect of foreign judgments" or "mutual recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments", is especially important if the losing party has no assets in the country where the judgment was given.

1 Presidency conclusions of 16.10.1999, points 28 to 39.

2 Private international law does not have the same meaning in all Member States. In German or Portuguese law, for example, it only designates the rules concerning conflict of laws, whereas in other systems it also includes the rules concerning the international jurisdiction of the courts and the recognition of foreign judgments. In this document, the term is used in its broad sense.

Practically speaking, where a court action is to be brought in an international dispute, the first question is which country's courts have international jurisdiction. Once this has been determined, this court will decide which law is applicable to the dispute. It is only when this court has given judgment that the problem of enforcement abroad will arise.

Traditionally, each Member State has its own national rules of private international law. But this entails the major inconvenience of a lack of uniformity and legal certainty and also the risk that the parties or one of them might take advantage of the fact that their case has links with various legal systems to escape the law normally applicable to them. To return to the example of the Greek consumer and the German seller, just imagine that the sales contract between them contains a clause choosing the law of a third country that has no consumer protection provisions. This practice, if it were valid, would be repugnant as it would deprive the consumer of the protection provided for by both Greek and German law.

To combat such inconvenience and practices, the Member States have therefore chosen to harmonise their rules of private international law. So far they have concentrated on contractual and non-contractual obligations in civil and commercial matters.

1.3. The Rome Convention, the Brussels I Regulation and the future Rome II instrument - three complementary instruments

No picture of the objectives of the Rome Convention is complete without a reminder of its predecessor, the Brussels Convention of 1968 (replaced since 1 March 2002, except for Denmark, by the Brussels I Regulation).[3] This was drawn up on the idea, already described in the EC Treaty, that a common market implies the possibility of having a judgment given in another Member State recognised and enforced with the minimum of difficulty. To facilitate this objective, the Brussels Convention begins with rules determining the Member State whose courts have jurisdiction.[4]

But merely having rules on jurisdiction does not fully exclude arbitrary factors in settling the dispute on the substance. The Brussels Convention and the Regulation which replaces it contain a number of options enabling the claimant to choose between this or that court. The risk is that parties will opt for the courts of one Member State rather than another simply because the applicable law in this state would be more favourable to them. This practice is known as "forum-shopping". By unifying the Member States' rules on conflict of laws, the Rome Convention ensures that the same solution will be applied as to the substance irrespective of the court hearing the case and thus reduces the risk of forum-shopping in the European Union.

But there is a great difference between the scope of the Brussels Convention and the scope of the Rome Convention: the first covers both contractual and non-contractual obligations, whereas the second covers only the former. Should the work on a future Rome II instrument on the law applicable to non-contractual relations[5] succeed, this instrument will therefore be

3 Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22.12.2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, replacing the Brussels Convention of 1968, the consolidated version of which was published in the OJ C 27, 26.1.1998, p. 1. But the Brussels Convention of 1968 remains in force for relations between Denmark and the other Member States.

4 The rules on jurisdiction in the 1968 Convention and the Brussels I Regulation are not basically what this Green Paper is about, but we refer to some of them when considering the various conflict rules (point 3).

5 On 3 May 2002 the Commission launched a wide-ranging consultation on a preliminary draft proposal for a Council Regulation on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations in order to collect the the natural extension of the work on unifying the private international law rules on contractual and non-contractual obligations of a civil and commercial nature in the Community.

Before looking in closer detail at the conflict rules of the Rome Convention, it is worth briefly describing their objectives.

1.4. Objectives of the rules concerning conflict of laws as regards contracts

For each conflict of laws rule, the legislature has a number of options. To explain why one or other option is preferred, we should begin by reviewing two principles – the principle of the proper law and the principle of freedom of choice.

The principle of the proper law is that a situation should be governed by the legal order which has the closest connection with it. This principle is particularly significant as regards international jurisdiction, for example when a dispute concerns a building or a traffic accident: the court for the place of where the building is situated or the place where the accident occurred is generally best placed to assess the facts and gather evidence. The principle of freedom of choice is that the parties may themselves choose the law which will govern relations between them, this solution being easily comprehensible in one of the example quoted above – the contract between two companies, German and English. This is the dominant principle in contract cases, enshrined in the positive law almost everywhere.

In the last twenty years or so, another principle has come to the fore, that of the protection of the weaker party. In the example of the Greek consumer and the German supplier quoted above, the two parties are not on equal footing. If there are no limits on the principle of free will, consumers may well have to accept a law which is unfavourable to them, thus depriving them of the protection which they are entitled to expect when they buy consumer goods, even abroad. The same reasoning applies to the relationship between employer and employee.

All these principles are present in the rules of the Rome Convention of 1980.

1.5. Outline of the rules of the Rome Convention

The uniform rules of the Rome Convention "apply to contractual obligations in any situation involving a choice between the laws of different countries",[6] i.e. in situations in which all the elements are not connected to the legal order of one and the same State. For instance, the parties to the contract may be of different nationality or domiciled in different States, or the contract may be made or performed in different countries or in a country different from that of the court hearing the case.

The Rome Convention is what is known as a "universal" convention,[7] i.e. the conflict rules that it enacts can lead to the application of the law of a non-EU State.

The Convention also provides for the exclusion of the following: the status or legal capacity of natural persons; the law governing family economic matters (wills, successions, marriage settlements, contracts covering maintenance responsibility); obligations arising from negotiable instruments (bills of exchange, cheques, promissory notes); the law governing companies, associations and other legal entities; arbitration agreements and agreements on the choice of court; trusts; evidence and procedure.[8]

The keystone of the system is freedom of choice (Article 3), a principle which allows the parties to chose the law applicable to their contract. The freedom left to parties is not unlimited: they may choose any law, even if it has no objective connection with the contract; they may choose the law governing the contract after its conclusion and change their choice at any time during the life of the contract, in certain Member States even in the course of proceedings. Regarding the form of the choice, it "must be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the terms of the contract or the circumstances of the case", which can be ascertained from an explicit clause in the contract or alternatively from other elements of the contractual environment, the court being left the task of checking whether there is a tacit or implicit choice of law.

In the absence of a choice of law by the parties, the Convention retains the principle of the proper law, the contract then being governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected (Article 4). The contract is presumed to be most closely connected with the country where the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has his habitual residence. The "characteristic performance" is what makes it possible to distinguish one contract from another (e.g. the obligation of the vendor to transfer the property, in a sales contract; the obligation of a carrier to transport a good or a person, in a contract of carriage; etc.); the obligation to pay an amount of money does not therefore constitute the characteristic performance for the purposes of Article 4, though there may be exceptions. The Convention then provides for other presumptions as regards property rights and the carriage of goods. But the court can disregard these presumptions "if it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country."

Under certain conditions the Rome Convention, like the so-called "Brussels I" Regulation, contains special rules for weaker parties (consumers and workers, Articles 5 and 6). The choice of a law by the parties to the contract may not deprive a consumer or an employee of the protection of the mandatory provisions of the law which would be normally applicable to them – as designated in accordance with the general rules of the Convention – in the absence of a choice of law. In the absence of a choice of law, a consumer contract is governed by the law of the country of the consumer's habitual residence, and an employment contract is governed by the law of the place in which the employee habitually carries out his work in performance of the contract or in the absence of such a place, the law of the place in which he was engaged.

The Convention lays down special rules for certain matters (in particular assignment of claims and subrogation). It covers the law of contract in a very broad sense, since it governs the interpretation of the contract and its performance or non-performance as well as its extinction and nullity.

1.6. Connection with the "European contract law" project

There are those who are already considering the link between Rome I and the European contract law project.[9]

[8] Subject to Article 14 of the Convention.

The Commission communication of 2 July 2001 aimed at broadening the discussion on the future of European contract law at Community level and on the need for a change of approach regarding the substantive law.[10] In this paper the Commission in particular raised the issue of coherence of the EC acquis in the area of contract law and whether divergences in contract law between the Member States may hinder the proper functioning of the internal market. One of the options put forward, if a new approach turned out to be needed, was the adoption of a new Community instrument contributing to further approximation of the substantive law of contracts. Thus some commentators already called into question the value of working on rules prescribing the application of one or the other national rule.

There is, however, no reason for such questioning. In the Commission's opinion, the "European contract law" project does neither aim at the uniformisation of contract law nor at the adoption of a European civil law code. The Commission had already announced that a follow-up document would be published early in 2003. In addition, even assuming that one day there will be closer harmonisation of contract law in the Community, it is quite possible that this will concern only certain particularly important aspects and that the applicable law will still have to be determined for the non-harmonised aspects. Conflict of laws' rules will therefore lose none of their importance for Community cross-border transactions, today and in the future.

Accordingly, the European contract law project does not detract in any way from the arguments for considering a possible modernisation of the Rome Convention. On the contrary, both projects complement each other and will be conducted in parallel.

1.7. Initiatives already taken

To prepare the discussions on modernising the Convention, the Commission provided finance under the GROTIUS CIVIL 2000 programme for a project submitted by the Academy of European Law in Trier for establishment of a database accessible on line relating to the implementation of the Convention by the courts of the Member States. This web site[11] already contains a number of references to case law.

In addition, on 4 and 5 November 1999, when preparing Regulation (EC) No 44/2000 (Brussels I), DG JAI organised a hearing covering the private international law and electronic commerce. It received 74 written contributions from professional bodies, consumers' associations, public institutions, companies and researchers. A major part of the comments covers the question of the law applicable to contracts concluded via Internet.

Lastly, the EUROPEAN GROUP FOR PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW (GEDIP) has been working on possible improvements to the Convention, culminating in specific proposals for amendment of the current text.[12]

Before considering whether the conflict of laws rules in the Convention should be modernised (part 3), the reasons which could possibly justify its conversion into a Community instrument should be analysed (part 2).

But first of all, the Commission wishes to take the opportunity to gather precise information concerning what economic actors – companies, consumers and workers as well as legal practitioners – actually know about the existence of the Rome Convention and the rules it contains. The Commission also wonders how this knowledge or the lack of it influences the parties' practical conduct in their contractual relations or court proceedings.

Question 1:	Do you have information concerning economic actors' and legal practitioners' actual knowledge of the Rome Convention of 1980 and of its rules, in particular the rule allowing parties to freely choose the law applicable to their contract? If you consider that such knowledge in sufficient, do you think that this situation has a negative impact on the parties' conduct in their contractual relations or on court proceedings?

2. CONVERTING THE ROME CONVENTION OF 1980 INTO A COMMUNITY INSTRUMENT

At Community level, the Rome Convention is the only private international law instrument still in the form of an international Treaty. Therefore the question of its conversion into a Community instrument has been raised.

Converting the Convention into a Community instrument could have a number of advantages, the first of which would be greater consistency in Community legislation on private international law (point 2.2), based on Article 61(c) of the Treaty (point 2.1). It would, in addition, entail conferring on the Court of Justice the jurisdiction to interpret it in the best conditions (point 2.3) and would facilitate the application of the standardised conflict rules in the new Member States (point 2.4).

2.1. A new legal basis: Article 61 c) of the EC Treaty as amended at Amsterdam gave a new impetus to Community-based private international law

While Community instruments on private international law were adopted on the basis of Article 293 (formerly Article 220) of the Treaty (Brussels Convention of 1968) or have the same status as instruments adopted on this basis (Rome Convention of 1980), since the entry into force of the Treaty of Amsterdam, this field is governed by the first pillar of the European Union.

In addition, on the basis of Article 61(c) of the Treaty, the Community has adopted several new Regulations for judicial cooperation in civil matters (Brussels II,[13] Bankruptcy,[14] Service of documents[15] and Evidence[16]) and converted the Brussels Convention of 1968 into a Regulation. The Commission is currently preparing a Community instrument on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II). The Vienna Action Plan[17] of the Council and the Commission, adopted by the Council in 1998, refers specifically to the compatibility of the conflict rules. Point 40(c) calls for "revision, where necessary, of certain provisions of the Convention on the Law applicable to contractual obligations, taking into account special provisions on conflict of law rules in other Community instruments". The Mutual Recognition Programme[18] specifies that measures to harmonise conflict of laws rules constitute supporting measures, facilitating implementation of the principle of mutual recognition of judgments in civil and commercial matters.

Upon entry into force of the Nice Treaty, the "co-decision" procedure which provides for a stronger participation of the European Parliament to the legislative process will apply to cooperation in civil matters, except for family law.

2.2. Consistency of Community legislation as regards private international law

Since the rules on jurisdiction and choice of law applying to contractual and non-contractual obligations of a civil or commercial nature form an entity, the fact that the Rome Convention takes a different form from the other Community instruments of private international law does not improve the consistency of this entity.

In addition, since the Rome Convention takes the form of an international Treaty, it contains a number of provisions that will have to be reviewed in the light of the concern for consistency in Community legislative policy, among them:

- the right of the Member States, under Article 22, to enter reservations (relating to Articles 7(1) and 10(1)(e);

- the right of the Member States, under Article 23, to adopt new choice of law rules in regard to any particular category of contract;

- the right of the Member States, under Article 24, to accede to multilateral Conventions on conflict of laws; and

- the limited (though renewable) duration of the Convention (Article 30).

It needs to be examined whether these provisions are compatible with the aim of establishing a genuine area of justice.

2.3. Interpretation of the Convention by the Court of Justice

An analysis of the first judgments given by national courts that certain Articles of the Convention are not always being applied uniformly, in particular because the national courts tend to interpret the Convention in the light of previous solutions, either to fill in gaps in the Convention or to modify the interpretation of certain flexible provisions. Examples of these differences can be found in Article 1(1) (material scope: definition of contract, for example the question whether contract chains should be included) or Article 3(1) (definition of tacit choice: what about the reference to a legal concept specific to a given legal system).[19]

There is no doubt that uniform interpretation of the Rome Convention by the Court of Justice would improve the consistency of the interpretation of conflict of laws' rules at EC level.

In a Joint Declaration,[20] the Member States stated that they were ready to examine the possibility of conferring jurisdiction in certain matters on the Court of Justice, and the Convention has been supplemented by two Protocols conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Justice to interpret the Convention. But they are not yet in force.[21]

Converting the Convention into a Community instrument would ensure that the Court of Justice would have identical jurisdiction over all the Community private international law instruments. The Court of Justice could therefore ensure that the legal concepts common to the Rome Convention and the Brussels I Regulation[22] are interpreted in the same manner.

Here one should also bear in mind that the jurisdiction conferred on the Court of Justice under Title IV could well expand in the future. However, the ratification of the two protocols to the Rome Convention remains important for contracts concluded before the entry into force of a possible future "Rome I" instrument which would continue to be governed by the Rome Convention. The latter will therefore remain the relevant text for an important number of existing contracts.

2.4. The application of the standardised conflict rules in the new Member States

The Rome Convention of 1980 is part of the 'acquis communautaire'. From the point of view of enlargement of the Union, the adoption of a Community instrument would prevent the entry into force of the uniform conflict rules from being delayed by ratification procedures in the applicant countries.

To illustrate this remark it is enough to recall that the Conventions of Funchal[23] and Rome,[24] concerning the accession of Spain and Portugal and Austria, Finland and Sweden, have still not been ratified by all the Member States. As the initial text was amended slightly on this occasion, two different versions of the Rome Convention therefore coexist today.[25]

19 Another source of divergent interpretations is that certain Member States have chosen to incorporate the provisions of the Convention in their national legislation by statute, sometimes amending the original text.

20 The consolidated text of the Convention as amended by the various Conventions of Accession, and the declarations and protocols annexed to it, is published in OJ C 27, 26.1.1998, p. 34.

21 Ratification of the second protocol by Belgium is still needed for the first protocol conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Justice to enter into force in all the Member States which have ratified it (i.e. all Member States except Belgium and Ireland); for progress with ratifications, see: http://ue.eu.int/Accords/default.asp?lang=en.

25 The amendment made by the Funchal Convention mainly concerned the deletion of Article 27 on the geographical scope of the Convention.

2.5. The choice of instrument: regulation or directive?

For the choice of the type of measure to be adopted - a regulation or a directive - it must be borne in mind that, in accordance with the Mutual Recognition Programme, the harmonisation of the conflict rules contributes to the mutual recognition of court judgments in the Union.

One should also take into consideration that the point is not to regulate one or the other aspect of a matter – as is the case of sectoral Directives – but to harmonise an entire subject-matter – the private international law of obligations.

It seems that this objective can more easily be reached if a possible future Rome I instrument is in the form of a regulation, the instrument being directly applicable and its application avoiding the uncertainties of the transposal of a directive.

Question 2:	Do you believe the Rome Convention of 1980 should be converted into a Community instrument? What are your arguments for or against doing this?

3. IS THERE A NEED FOR MODERNISING THE ROME CONVENTION OF 1980?

Since a good many of the substantive conflict rules entered into force barely eleven years ago, many will be surprised by the question. But there are several arguments for doing so.

First of all, the Member States undertook to consider the advisability of revising Article 5 concerning consumer protection at the time of Austrian accession to the Rome Convention: the explanatory report on the Convention of Accession specifies that this must be done in the near future and a declaration to this effect was annexed to the Final Act of the Conference of the Governments of the Member States.[26]

Then there is the close link between the Rome Convention and the related instrument in matters of conflicts of jurisdiction – the Brussels Convention. When this was converted into a Community Regulation, some of its articles were changed, too[27]. Some point out that the consistency of the Community private international law demands that these amendments be reflected in the instrument that deals with conflict of laws.

Moreover, there is a body of case law covering a period that is longer than the period during which the Convention has been in force. Several signatory States had already incorporated its provisions into their national legislation unilaterally before it actually entered into force.[28] In other Member States, the Convention inspired judges even before it entered into force.

It is manifest in this case law that certain essential rules of the Convention are criticised on grounds of insufficient precision. But it must be borne in mind that this is not one of those areas where strict precision is always possible, and a balance must be sought between rules that would give the judges complete freedom to determine the applicable law and, on the other hand, rigid rules that leave no opportunity for flexibility in the case in question.

[28] Denmark, Luxembourg, Germany and Belgium.

Consequently, the value of revising the substance cannot therefore lie in clarifying in minute detail all the points on which divergent interpretations are possible but in sorting out the most debatable points. Before considering these points Article by Article (at point 3.2), there are broader questions concerning the general balance of the Convention (point 3.1).

3.1. The general balance of the Convention

3.1.1. Link between the general conflict rules of the Rome Convention and the rules in sectoral instruments that have an impact on the applicable law

3.1.1.1. The proliferation of rules in sectoral instruments that have an impact on the applicable law

The proliferation of sectoral instruments of Community secondary legislation containing isolated conflict rules[29] or of rules that determine the scope of territorial application of community law and therefore having an impact on the applicable law[30] has aroused extensive comment. The effect of Article 20 of the Convention and the general principles of law[31] is that these special rules governing specific matters derogate from Convention rules of general scope. In most cases, the sectoral rules meet the aim to strengthen the protection of weaker parties (cf. point 3.2.6, infra).[32]

But their proliferation is a source of concern. According to some, this is likely to harm the consistency of the body of conflict rules applicable in the Union. An example often cited is the rules have an impact on the applicable law in the consumer protection Directives, which use a mechanism differing from that of the conflict rules as such[33] and also contain formulas that vary slightly from one instrument to another. In addition, transposal by the Member States does not always reflect the spirit of the Directives, in particular when a bilateral rule becomes unilateral.[34]

29 In particular: Directive on the return of cultural objects unlawfully removed from the territory of a Member State (1993/7, 15.3.1993); Directive concerning the posting of workers in the framework of the provision of services (1996/71, 16.12.1996); Directive 1944/44 of 25 May 1999 on certain aspects of sale and of the guarantees of the consumer goods. There is also a coherent set of conflict rules applicable to insurance in the following Directives: second non-life insurance Directive (1988/357 of 22 June 1988), as supplemented and amended by Directives 1992/49 and 2002/13; second life assurance Directive (1990/619 of 8 November 1990), as supplemented and amended by Directives 1992/96 and 2002/12.

30 A certain number of directives contain a provision that, although not being a conflict of laws' rule, have an impact on the applicable law to a contract. If the contract has a direct link to the territory of one or more Member States, these provisions provide for the application of Community law even if the parties chose the law of a third country. The following instruments contain such a clause: Unfair terms Directive (1993/13, 5.4.1993); Timeshare Directive (1994/47, 26.10.1994); Directive 97/7 of 20 May 1997 on the protection of consumers in respect of distance contracts; Directive on the sale and guarantees of consumption goods (1999/44, 25.5.1999); Directive on distance sales of financial services (2002/65, 23.9.2002)

31 "Generalia specialibus derogant" – special laws derogate from general laws.

32 The provisions concerning the territorial scope of the consumer directives find their reason in the fact that the protection given by Article 5 of the Convention is not always considered as being sufficient; cf. pint 3.2.7, infra

33 Cf. note 34, supra.

34 Most of the rules of conflict of laws are bilateral, i.e. they can designate either a foreign law or the law of the forum. For example, there is a French rule according to which the court must determine a child's affiliation on the basis of the law of the mother's nationality. If the mother is French, the French court will apply French law; if she is Italian, it will apply Italian law. According to the unilateralist method, each state is satisfied with determining the cases where its own law is applicable in order not to give

Other commentators argue that this dispersal of the conflict rules make it very difficult for the reader, and in particular for the expert, to determine what text is applicable, in the context of the broader debate in progress in the European Union on codification of the 'acquis communautaire' to improve transparency.[35]

3.1.1.2. Possible solutions

Several solutions are currently under discussion, ranging from measures enabling experts to find their way more easily around the mass of existing legislation to genuine codification of the Community conflict rules:

i. existing legislation might be more reader-friendly if there were an annex to the future instrument, listing the references of sectoral instruments of secondary legislation containing conflict rules and updated each time an instrument is adopted;

ii. special rules could be incorporated in the future Community instrument. The real question would then be whether the aim is to move towards a general instrument covering all the Community conflict rules in contractual matters. This de facto raises the question of codification of the 'acquis communautaire';

iii. the rules in the sectoral instruments that have an impact on the applicable law aim in general at better protection for weaker parties. However, the present Green paper precisely takes up some reflections currently under discussion among academic writers in order to, on the one hand, introduce a general clause that guarantees the application of a Community minimum standard (cf. point 3.1.2., infra) and, on the other hand, to modernise Article 5 of the Convention on consumer contracts (cf. point 3.2.7, infra). If these amendments were made, some have already suggested to repeal the rules in sectoral instruments.

Question 3:	Are you aware of difficulties encountered because of the proliferation and dispersal of rules having an impact on the applicable law in several horizontal and sectoral instruments of secondary legislation? If so, what do you think is the best way of remedying them?

3.1.2. Envisage a clause to guarantee the use of the Community minimum standard when all the elements or some of the elements of the contract are located in the Community

3.1.2.1. The risk that Community law is not applied although all the elements of the case are located in the Union

There are and always will be situations in which a weaker party does not enjoy the benefit of the protective rules of the Convention owing to the specific circumstances of the case. The parties' autonomy can thus lead to the application of the law of a third State. If all parties involved are Community nationals, such a result goes against the spirit of the Convention and of Community law in general.

jurisdiction to the law of another State in a case where that state does not want it to be applied. Based on the idea that private international law serves to resolve conflicts of sovereignty, such rules are the exception nowadays. An example is Article 3 subparagraph 3 of the French Civil Code: "t*he laws on the status and capacity of persons govern French persons, even those residing abroad*".

[35] Cf. Commission communication to Parliament and the Council on Codification of the Acquis communautaire, COM (2001) 645 final, 21.11.2001.

As will be seen (point 3.2.7, infra), it may happen that a "mobile" consumer is unprotected against the application of the law of a third country. For example, where a Portuguese consumer goes to Belgium to make a purchase, no provision of the Rome Convention forbids the seller from submitting the contract to the law of a non-European country which has no consumer protection rules.[36]

Admittedly, one could point to the fact that the protection of weaker parties is also and in particular contained in a number of Directives that comprise rules on the scope of application in order to avoid that a choice of law of a third state leads to their non-application. (point 3.1.1, supra). However, some argue that such a mechanism is not sufficient: apart from making it more difficult to identify the applicable rule, the sectoral Directives, as their title indicates, do not apply across the full range of civil law but only in certain areas of it. Lastly, the sectoral Directive technique is also unsatisfactory in that the consumer cannot rely on the provisions of a Directive that has not been transposed or has been incorrectly transposed.[37]

3.1.2.2. Possible solutions

The modernisation of articles 5 and 6, as discussed under point 3.2.7 infra, would admittedly allow to correct some shortcomings of their current wording. But consideration should be given to another solution– a clause to guarantee the Community minimum standard where all elements, or the very characteristic elements, of the contract are located in the Community.

Such a clause could be based on Article 3(3) of the present Convention, which specifies that "where all the other elements relevant to the situation at the time of the choice are connected with one country only", the fact that the parties have chosen a foreign law may not prejudice the application of that country's mandatory rules of law.

Likewise, the future Rome I instrument could specify that, if a directive imposes the respect for minimum standards, the parties cannot circumvent this by virtue of the rules on conflict of laws by choosing the law of a third country for contracts that are purely internal to the Community. A provision along the following lines has been suggested: "The fact that the parties have chosen the law of a non-member country shall not prejudice the application of the mandatory rules of Community law where all the other elements relevant to the situation at the time when the contract is signed are connected with one or more Member States."[38]

This proposal has to be seen also in the light of the Ingmar decision of the European Court of Justice. Despite the fact that not all elements of this case were situated within the Community – the principal was established in the US – the Court of Justice held that certain articles of the Directive 86/653 on commercial agents apply because the commercial agent had exercised his activity in a Member State[39].

36 There remain obviously the safety-nets in the form of public-order legislation – the rules that the court can apply whatever the law applicable to the contract (cf. point 3.2.8, infra). This device, however, is burdensome: there are only few rules that can be clearly identified as such – the foreseeability of the judicial solution is thus far from being guaranteed.

37 Because directives do not have horizontal direct effect. Thus the German Gran Canaria jurisprudence has its origins in the non-transposition of the Directive 85/577 of 20.12.1985 by Spain (cf. note 61, infra).

38 As to the notion "mandatory rules", cf. point 3.2.8., infra

39 Case 381/98 Ingmar GB Ltd c/ Eato Lonard Technologies Inc [2000] ECR 263 (judgment given 9.11.2000).

Question 4:	Do you think a possible future instrument should contain a general clause guaranteeing the application of a Community minimum standard when all elements, or at least certain highly significant elements, of the contract are located within the Community? Does the wording proposed at 3.1.2.2 allow the objective pursued to be attained?

3.1.3. Relationship with existing international conventions

Even a Community instrument could make it possible for Member States to continue implementing conflict rules contained in international conventions to which they are currently Parties. The point of this would be to avoid conflicts between the rules in those Conventions and the rules in the Community instrument. And Member States which are already Parties to such Conventions would not have to denounce them.

This solution has the disadvantage of enabling these States to apply rules diverging from those provided for by the Community instrument, which would detract from the creation of a genuine common law-enforcement area. But this is only a slight risk, as the content of these rules is already perfectly known and the Member States would no longer be able to accede individually to other Conventions once the proposed Community instrument is adopted. Under the rule in AETR,[40] the adoption of a Community instrument standardising the rules of conflict of laws relating to civil and commercial contracts would confer exclusive power on the Community to negotiate and adopt international instruments on such matters.

This possibility could be accompanied by an obligation for the Member States to notify the relevant international conventions so as to guarantee transparency and certainty as to the law. The list could be reproduced in an annex to a Rome I instrument.

Question 5:	Do you have comments on the guidelines identified above?

3.2. Problems met in the implementation of various Articles

3.2.1. Scope of the Convention - exclusion of arbitration and choice of forum clauses (Article 1(2)(d))

Arbitration clauses – which provide for the designation of an arbitrator or an arbitration board rather than a court in the event of a dispute – and choice of forum clauses – i.e. clauses designating the court having jurisdiction in the event of a dispute – are excluded from the scope of the Convention.

The exclusion of arbitration agreements is not a problem, as there are a number of treaties on the matter. But they more often concern the recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards than the law applicable to the arbitration agreement itself.

Regarding choice of forum clauses, Article 23 of the Brussels I Regulation does contain material rules, directly laying down certain conditions for the validity of such clauses, but the Article does not settle all aspects of the matter.

Question 6:	Do you think one should envisage conflict rules applicable to arbitration and choice of forum clauses?

[40] Case 22/70 Commission v Council [1971] ECR 263 (judgment given on 31.3.1971).

3.2.2. Rules applicable to insurance contracts (Article 1(3))

3.2.2.1. The current situation

Insurance contracts covering risks located on the territory of the Union are excluded from the scope of the Convention. The reason for this exclusion is that, in parallel with the negotiations for the Rome Convention, another group of experts was working on private international law and freedom to provide services as regards insurance. Several sectoral Directives[41] govern the conflict of laws specifically for insurance.

Accordingly, three hypothetical situations need to be distinguished depending, whether on the risk is or is not located in a Member State and whether the insurer is or is not established in the Community:

a) the risk is located outside the territory of the Union: the applicable law is determined according to the rules of the Convention, whether the insurer is established in the Community or not; under the general rules of the Convention (Article 4), in the absence of a choice of law, the contract is presumed to be most closely connected with the country in which the insurer is established;

b) the risk is located in the Union and is covered by an insurer established in the Community: the applicable law is determined in accordance with the rules of the insurance directives, which differ appreciably from the general solutions of the Convention. Directive 90/619 on life insurance lays down the general rule that the law of the state where the policy-holder habitually resides apply if the policy-holder is a private individual. This solution, which treats the policy-holder effectively as a consumer, corresponds to the one applied in most non-member countries;

c) the risk is located in the Union and is covered by an insurer not established in the Community: the applicable law is determined in accordance with the national conflict rules of each Member State; there is no harmonised solution for the Union.

3.2.2.2. Questions regarding the current situation

The current situation has been criticised by specialists in private international law, in particular because it is not strictly compatible with the concern for transparency in Community law; insurance law specialists can identify the applicable rules, but the more general public cannot always do so.

Then there is the question whether situation (a), in which the insurer's law is applied, is in line with the general aim, also described in the Brussels I Regulation,[42] of ensuring a high level of protection where the policy-holder is a private individual.

Lastly, it may seem surprising that there are no harmonised conflict rules for situation (c) (risk located in the European Union covered by an insurer established outside the Community). But insurance specialists stress that in practice there is no need to worry about hypothesis (c), as the rules concerning freedom to provide services require the non-Community service provider to declare an address for service in the Union, which brings them under Community law.

41 The Directives mentioned in footnote 29 above. It should be noted that on 27 May 2002 the Council adopted a joint position for the adoption of a consolidated version of the life assurance Directives (OJ C 170 E, 16.7.2002, p. 45). Work is also in hand to consolidate the Directives on non-life insurance, to be completed in 2003.

42 Section 3 of the Brussels Convention of 1968 already contained special rules on jurisdiction.

3.2.2.3. Possible solutions

The following avenues could be explored:

i. Do the Convention's general rules, applying in situation (a), adequately reflect the specific nature of insurance contracts. Would it not be preferable to envisage a special conflict rule, like the Brussels I Regulation? Or should the Community, like most other countries, ignore risks which are not located on its territory?

ii. To improve the transparency of Community legislation, the special rules on insurance might conceivably be incorporated in a future Rome I instrument. But if the instrument was a Regulation, this is not necessarily the appropriate legislative technique for rules concerning insurance: when the insurance directives were prepared, the Community legislature wished to leave the Member States some room for manoeuvre regarding connecting factors to allow the law of the policy-holder to apply, and such freedom is not compatible with a regulation. Most Member States, responding to the Commission's work on insurance and electronic commerce, expressed their wish not to incorporate the conflict rules in the Rome Convention or the instrument which will replace it.

iii. The annex giving a regular update of the conflict rules in sectoral instruments (point 3.1.1.2., supra) would make it possible to improve the legibility and transparency of the applicable rules.

Question 7:	How do you evaluate the current rules on insurance? Do you think that the current treatment of hypotheses (a) and (c) is satisfactory? How would you recommend resolving the difficulties that have been met (if any)?

3.2.3. Freedom of choice (Article 3(1)) - Questions regarding the choice of non-state rules

It is common practice in international trade for the parties to refer not to the law of one or other state but direct to the rules of an international convention such as the Vienna Convention of 11 April 1980 on contracts for the international sale of goods, to the customs of international trade, to the general principles of law, to the lex mercatoria or to recent private codifications such as the UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts.

In the minds of the authors of the Convention, such a choice does not constitute a choice of law within the meaning of Article 3, which can only be choice of a body of state law: a contract containing such a choice would be governed by the law applicable in the absence of a choice (Article 4), and it would fall to this law to determine the role to be played by the non-state rules chosen by the parties.[43] Traditionally, most academic writers have ruled out the possibility of choosing non-state rules, particularly because there is not yet a full and consistent body of such rules.

[43] Cf. P. Lagarde, Le nouveau droit international privé des contrats après l'entrée en vigueur de la Convention de Rome du 19 juin 1980, RCDIP, 1980.287.

Others would prefer the choice of non-state law to constitute a choice of law for the purposes of Article 3 of the Rome Convention.[44] One of the reasons brought forward to this is that one should not refuse a practice before the court that is already admitted (in many countries) before arbitrators.

Concerning more specifically the parties' choice of the rules of the Vienna Convention of 11 April 1980, the Dutch courts have twice ruled on situations in which the Convention did not apply directly pursuant to its Article 1(1).[45] According to the Hoge Raad, the Dutch Supreme Court, the parties were free to designate this Convention as the law applicable to their contract. There is still the question of the effects of such a designation: if the contract had been purely internal, the rules of the Convention could not have derogated from the mandatory rules of the law applicable in the absence of a choice. But since the contract was an international contract, the Court acknowledged that the choice of the Convention ruled out the mandatory rules of the law applicable in the absence of a choice.[46] It did not refer to the law which would have been applicable in the absence of a choice to ascertain the role that it would confer on the Vienna Convention. In other words the parties themselves had genuinely chosen this Convention.

Question 8:	Should the parties be allowed to directly choose an international convention, or even the general principles of law? What are the arguments for or against this solution?

3.2.4.1. The legislature's intention

Once the principle of freedom of choice is accepted, it must be ensured that the parties actually exercise this right to choose the law applicable to their contract. According to the second sentence of Article 3(2), "the choice must be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the terms of the contract or the circumstances of the case". However, some translations of the Convention seem to be more flexible than others[47], and it is not impossible that this difference is at the root of divergent interpretations in the countries concerned.

The legislature's intention was to admit a clear choice, even if it was tacit. In addition to the frequent case of a deliberate clause inserted in the contract, the choice of law can therefore be ascertained either from other provisions of the contract or from aspects of the contractual environment: the first situation would include, for example, acceptance of a standard-form contract governed by a specific legal system, even in the absence of any deliberate clarification as to the applicable law, the text leaving it to the court to check that the choice, though tacit, is real, or a reference to provisions of a given law without this law being designated in the aggregate. Regarding the "circumstances of the case", a contract might be 44 Cf. K. Boele-Woelki, Principles and Private International Law - The UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts and the Principles of European Contract Law: How to Apply Them to International Contracts, Uniform Law Review, 1996.652.

45 Article 1(1) of the Convention specifies that it applies "to contracts of sale of goods between parties whose places of business are in different States: a) when the States are Contracting States; or b) when the rules of private international law lead to the application of the law of a Contracting State."

46 Hoge Raad, 26.5.1989, NJ 1992.105 and 5.1.2001, NJ 2001.391.

47 Instead of "with reasonable certainty" and "mit hinreichender Sicherheit" in the English and German version, the French version asks for "de façon certaine".

closely connected with an earlier contract in which there had been a deliberate choice of law, or it might be part of a series of operations, the law having been chosen only for the basic contract underlying the general operation.[48]

Article 3(2) on the other hand excludes the purely hypothetical choice deduced from excessively ambiguous contractual clauses. This boils down to the hypothesis of the absence of a choice by the parties, and the court will apply the presumptions of Article 4.

3.2.4.2. Difficulties encountered in applying this Article

The borderline between the tacit choice and the purely hypothetical choice is rather vague. Analysis of the case-law reveals a major difference of the solutions regarding this point: the German and English courts, perhaps under the influence of a slightly more flexible form of words, and under the influence of their previous solutions, are less strict about discerning a tacit choice than their European counterparts.

One of the recurring questions is how far an arbitration or choice of court clause can constitute an implicit choice of the law of the country whose courts or arbitrators are designated. The question arises in particular when the court is confronted with such a clause without further argument in favour of this choice. Divergences have also emerged regarding the role to be given to the parties' reference to technical standards or legal concepts belonging to the law of a given country.

3.2.4.3. Possible solutions

The legislature's intention having been to leave the court with considerable room for manoeuvre in interpreting the parties' choice, Article 3, which is a key provision of the Convention, is voluntarily written in general terms. This means that the question of revision must be approached very cautiously:

i. If the Convention is converted into a Community instrument, the Court of Justice would automatically have jurisdiction to interpret it. Admittedly, since Decisions would then be taken on a case-by-case basis, the fact that jurisdiction is conferred on the Court of Justice, which decides points of law and not of fact, would not mean that the concrete solution can be predicted in advance. But the court can reasonably be expected to define at least the general framework for the interpretation of Article 3(1), thus reducing the most glaring uncertainties;[49]

ii. The future instrument could itself give more precise information regarding the definition and the minimum requirements for there to be a tacit choice;

iii. To strengthen the uniform implementation of the Convention, it seems preferable to align the various language versions of the text.

48 Cf. examples given by the explanatory report on the Convention by Mr Guiliano and Mr Lagarde, OJ C 282, 31.10.1980.

49 The Court of Justice might also, for example, hold that the mere fact of designating the courts of a country does not constitute a choice of law if this choice is not corroborated by other factors.

Question 9:	Do you think that a future Rome I instrument should contain more precise information regarding the definition of a tacit choice of applicable law or would conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Justice suffice to ensure certainty as to the law?

3.2.5. What is the strength of the general presumption laid down by Article 4(2)

3.2.5.1. Current situation

Which law should be applied when the parties have made no explicit or tacit choice of the law applicable to their contract? The Convention follows the principle of the proper law: according to Article 4(1) the contract is governed by the law of the country with which it is most closely connected. The formula is deliberately vague: the court has to weigh up the factors that help to reveal the "centre of gravity" of the contract. That is sometimes a difficult task, and there is a risk of uncertainty as to the solution selected.

To strengthen certainty as to the law and help the court to determine the applicable law, Article 4(2) then establishes a general presumption that "the contract is most closely connected with the country where the party who is to effect the performance which is characteristic of the contract has, at the time of conclusion of the contract, his habitual residence".[50] The "characteristic" performance is what constitutes the centre of gravity of the contract, basically that which must be paid for depending on the type of contract – the obligation to transfer property in a sales contract, to provide a service in a service contract, to transport in a contract of carriage, to insure in an insurance contract, and so on. Art. 4 thus leads, in principle, to the application of the law of the seller or the service provider.

But the court can disregard this presumption "if it appears from the circumstances as a whole that the contract is more closely connected with another country" (Article 4(5)). It then applies the general rule of identifying the law with which the contract is most closely connected. This mechanism making it possible to return to the general rule is known as the "exception clause".

3.2.5.2. Difficulties encountered

In the spirit of many comments on the Convention, the exception clause of Article 4(5) must be used carefully and rarely since its frequent application leads to unforeseeability as to the applicable law – an unforeseeability that the presumptions of Art. 4 are precisely intended to reduce.

Thus, an analysis of the case-law reveals that in several cases the courts have applied the exception clause ab initio, seeking immediately the law that is most closely connected, without beginning with the presumption of Article 4(2).

3.2.5.3. Possible solution

The solution is closely bound up with the objective that one wishes to pursue with the conflict rule: is it to ensure the closest possible connection, which would encourage a flexible clause such as Article 4(5), or the highest degree of certainty as to the law, which would encourage the strict application of the presumption provided for in Article 4(2)?

[50] For certain types of contract (immovable property, contract for carriage of goods), the Convention establishes special presumptions (Article 4(3) and (4)).

Given the letter and spirit of the Convention, the courts might reasonably be expected to begin with the presumption of Article 4(2). Only if it emerged that the law designated is not appropriate because other circumstances clearly militate in favour of another law would the court then use the "exception clause". This is precisely the rule laid down in a Decision of the Dutch Hoge Raad, whereby the court must first apply the presumption of Article 4(2) and rule out the law thus obtained only if it is obviously unsuited to the instant case.[51]

To clarify the text on this point, it would be possible to review the drafting of Article 4. One possibility would be purely and simply to delete paragraph 1 so as to emphasise the exceptional character of paragraph 5. Another solution would be to amend paragraph 5 itself. Thus the future Rome I instrument could take as a starting point the preliminary draft proposal for a Council Regulation on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II), the exception clause in Article 3(3) of which introduces two new conditions in relation to the Rome Convention: it is required that there be "a substantially closer connection [between the tortious/delictual act and] another country" and also that "there is no significant connection between the non-contractual obligation and the country whose law would be the applicable law under paragraphs 1 and 2."

Question 10: Do you believe that Article 4 should be redrafted to compel the court to begin by applying the presumption of paragraph 2 and to rule out the law thus obtained only if it is obviously unsuited to the instant case? If so, how do you think it would be best drafted?

3.2.6. Application of the special presumption in property matters to holiday leasing agreements (Article 4(3))

3.2.6.1. Current solution

When the subject matter of the contract is a right in immovable property or a right to use immovable property (sale contract, deed or lease of an apartment, for example), it is presumed be most closely connected with the law of the place where the property is situated (Article 4(3)). The reason for this rule is that States traditionally want buildings located in their territory to be governed by their own law, in particular owing to the importance of property for the social and economic organisation of the country.

3.2.6.2. Difficulties encountered in the application of this Article

The special presumption in property matters also covers contracts for very short-term holiday accommodation. For instance, a German landlord, being a private individual or a travel agency, owns a house in the South of Spain and rents it to German private individuals. The tenants are not satisfied with the state of the house and wish to recover part of the rent. As this [51] Nouvelles des Papeteries de l' Aa v. BV Machinenfabriek BOA, Hoge Raad, 25 September 1992: when the characteristic performance could be ascertained, § 2 contained the main rule and the exception to that rule contained in § 5 should therefore be interpreted restrictively. In other words, § 2 should be disapplied only if, in the light of special factors, the country of habitual residence of the party carrying out the characteristic performance had "no real value as a connecting factor".

contract concluded between two Germans concerns immovable property, it would be governed by the Spanish law under Article 4(3).[52]

It was already suggested in the explanatory report on the Convention that in such circumstances the courts could apply the exception clause in Article 4(5). Some courts have already done so.[53]

Some authors do however not approve the frequent use of the exception clause in article 4 (5) because it leads to uncertainty with respect to the outcome of a procedure.

In addition, this solution may be incompatible with the Brussels I Regulation, Article 22 of which contains - unlike the Brussels Convention of 1968 - a specific rule on "tenancies of immovable property concluded for temporary private use for a maximum period of six consecutive months". Under certain circumstances the parties are then allowed to derogate from the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the place where the immovable property is situated and to bring proceedings in the courts of the Member state of the landlord's and tenant's common domicile.

3.2.6.3. Possible solution

The EUROPEAN GROUP FOR PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW suggested Article 4 (3) should contain a specific rule on short-term holiday tenancy, along the lines of the second subparagraph of Article 22 of the Brussels I Regulation. The wording could be the following: "However, contracts which have as their object tenancies of immovable property concluded for a temporary private use for a maximum period of six consecutive months will be governed by the laws of the country in which the lessor is domiciled, provided that the tenant is a natural person and that the landlord and the tenant are domiciled in the same country."[54] Should such a clause be inserted to article 4 (3), the judge would still be allowed to apply the exception clause of article 4 (5) to compensate for the rigidity of such a rule.

Question 11: Do you believe on should create a specific rule on short-term holiday tenancy, along the lines of the second subparagraph of Article 22(1) of the Brussels I Regulation, or the present solution is it satisfactory?

3.2.7. The protection of consumers (Article 5)

3.2.7.1. Summary of the contents and scope of the protective rules of Article 5

Since the 1970s a new special body of law – consumer law – has emerged to reflect the imbalance between consumers and professionals. Special rules, such as the nullity of unfair terms or the right to withdraw from a contract unilaterally within a certain time, now protect the consumer against rash commitments.

52 Article 5 does not apply if the lessor himself is a private individual. If the lessor is a professional, Article 5 (4) provides that the consumer protecting rules do not apply in a contract for the supply of services "where the services are to be supplied to the consumer exclusively in a country other than that in which he has his habitual residence".

53 BGH, 12 October 1998, IPRAX 1990,318: application of the German law to a contract in which a German travel agency supplied its German customers with holiday houses in France.

54 Care will have to be taken with the consistency of legal terminology in the future instrument, as Article 22 of the Brussels I Regulation introduces the concept of "natural person", which might appear less restrictive than "consumer".

But the protective rules in force in the country of the consumer's habitual residence, i.e. those on which the consumer basically relies for protection, would be rendered ineffective in international or intra-Community trade if they could be excluded merely by choosing a foreign law. To reassure consumers, who have a vital role to play in an internal market which has no hope of success without their active participation, the Rome Convention envisages special conflict rules.

But Article 5 also aims to preserve a degree of balance between the parties. That is why it states the conditions for its application precisely.

Article 5 lays down a double rule: on the one hand, in the absence of choice, the contract is governed by the law of the country in which the consumer has his habitual residence (Article 5(3)). Moreover, "a choice of law made by the parties shall not have the result of depriving the consumer of the protection afforded to him by the mandatory rules of the law of the country in which he has his habitual residence" (Article 5(2)). The application of this provision leads to a situation described as "dépeçage", i.e. different parts of a same contract are ruled by the laws of two ore even more countries. Thus a contract between a consumer residing in country A and a business established in country B will contain very often a clause for making the law of country B applicable; when the conditions of Article 5 are met, the court must nevertheless give effect to certain provisions of the law of country A, those which relate to public policy and protect the consumer.[55] The court must accordingly apply two distinct laws to the same contract.

Regarding the conditions for application of Article 5, the scope of the protective rules is confined to certain types of contracts,[56] concluded with consumers, this concept being strictly defined, in quite precise circumstances. There are three of these circumstances, and they can be summarised by saying that, as a general rule and apart from the case of cross-border excursions organised by the vendor, there is no protection for the "mobile consumer", i.e. a consumer who travels to a country other than that of habitual residence to make a purchase or receive a service.[57] For the mobile consumer, the general conflict rules of Articles 3 and 4 apply, and they generally make the law of the seller's or service provider's residence applicable.

3.2.7.2. Difficulties encountered

The solution in Article 5, which was written at a time when consumer law and distance selling techniques were in their infancy, has come in for some criticism. Austria, for instance, made its accession to the Rome Convention conditional on consideration being given to revision of this Article.[58]

55 This involves in particular the right of the consumer to withdraw from the contract and to be protected against unfair terms, such as those releasing the professional from liability in the event of damage.

56 The contracts to which Article 5 applies are contracts for the supply of tangible goods or services and contracts to finance such supplies.

57 More precisely, the following three hypotheses are concerned. First, where the signing of the contract was preceded in the country of the consumer's habitual residence by a specific proposal (for example the sending of a catalogue or of an offer of contract) or advertising (via radio, television, newspaper, mail, whatever) if the consumer performed in this country the measures needed to conclude the contract. Second, where the professional received the order in the country of the consumer's habitual residence. Third, more specific, where the tradesman organised a "cross-border excursion" with the aim of prompting the consumer to conclude sale.

58 Cf. footnote 26, supra .

Article 5 is regarded by several academic writers as not giving the mobile consumer proper protection. It is clear from an analysis of the case law that, since the contract is not within the situations envisaged by this Article, a consumer contract can be governed by a foreign law which has no consumer protection provisions. His situation is still worsened when, as in an important German case, he finds himself also deprived of the benefit of the mandatory rules of article 7.[59]

Admittedly, thanks to a large number of EC directives, all consumers residing in the European Union now enjoy the benefit of a Community minimum protection standard.[60] But it must be borne in mind that these directives cover only certain aspects of legal rules which protect the consumer. In addition, there can still be differences from one country to another, in particular where a Member State fails to transpose a directive: since directives do not have horizontal direct effect, the consumer cannot rely on a provision not transposed into national law in his relations with his contracting partners.[61] Lastly, a certain number of EC directives introduce only a minimum standard of protection which falls short of the consumer protection given in certain Member States.

Article 5 is also criticised for the criteria on the basis of which it distinguishes consumers eligible for specific protection from those subject to the general system. These are the conditions for application of Article 5.[62] The criteria selected no longer seem adapted to the development of new distance selling techniques. To determine whether or not a contract is within the scope of Article 5, it is always necessary to locate it in space by reference to an aspect such as advertising, the signing of a contract or the receipt of an order (Article 5(2)). In addition, this solution is no longer in harmony with Article 15 of the Brussels I Regulation, under which consumer protection provisions apply where a company directs its business activities towards the Member State of the consumer's residence and a contract is concluded within the framework of these activities, whatever distance selling technique is used.[63]

59 Cf. judgment of the German BGH of 19.3.1997, quoted in footnote 61, infra. On the contrary, the French Cour de cassation recently decided that some of the rules on overindebtedness contained in the French Code de Consommation are mandatory within the meaning of Article 7 (Civ I, 10.7.2001, Bull. n° 210, N° 000-04-104).

60 Cf. point 3.1.2, supra.

58 Such a failure to transpose a Community Directive was at the source of two sets of cases (Gran Canaria) in the German courts, which culminated in a judgment of the Bundesgerichtshof. In the first set of cases, German tourists on holiday on the Spanish island of Gran Canaria were the victims of a German company manufacturing bed linen. It had an agreement with a local Spanish company which organised free bus excursions to a bird reserve. During the trip it advertised the products of the German company and gave the tourists a "sales contract" form, which they signed without paying anything immediately. It was stated that on returning to Germany the customers would receive confirmation of their orders from the German company. Disputes arose when, on their return to Germany, some of these tourists refused to pay the price invoiced by the German company and claimed to exert their right of withdrawal under German law, enacted under Directive 85/577. The legal question was whether the law applicable to these disputes was the German law, favourable to the customers, or Spanish law, specified as the applicable law by the contract, which, as Spain had not transposed part of the Directive at the material time, did not acknowledge the right to withdraw. In the second set of cases, German consumers travelling in the Canary Islands were subjected to hard-sell sessions and induced to sign contracts for the purchase of a timeshare in a holiday apartment. The contracts - some subject to the law of the Isle of Man, others to Spanish law - contained a non-withdrawal clause although withdrawal was possible in German law and Community law. The question was whether the consumers could rely on German law against the law chosen in the contract. The BGH ruled out any attempt to justify the application of the protective German law, even as mandatory rule of the forum within the meaning of Article 7.

62 Cf. note 57, supra .

63 Cf. joint declaration by the Commission and the Council concerning Articles 15 and 73 of the Brussels I Regulation, accessible at http://europa.eu.int/comm/justice_home/unit/civil_en.htm.

Lastly, some wonder about the use of the dépeçage mechanism. It raises theoretical questions,[64] and it will also be necessary to ascertain whether practical difficulties arise with its use in the courts.

3.2.7.3. Possible solutions

When consideration is given to the revision of Article 5, the general concerns for the protection for the consumer, in particular when all the facts of the case are located in the Union, and the need to preserve balance in the interests of the parties must be borne in mind. Future rules should be clear, general and as broad as possible, so that the parties can know clearly in advance what law will apply to their contractual relationship.

Consideration will extend to the nature of the protection given to the consumer (application of one or other law) and to the criteria for identifying the consumers actually eligible for the protective provisions, i.e. the conditions for application of them.

The following are some possible guidelines for the debate:

i. Maintenance of the current solution, with a general clause guaranteeing the use of the Community minimum protection standard (point 3.1.2, supra): This solution would make it possible to remedy situations in which the lack of Community consumer protection is the most blatant. But while such a clause would state that certain provisions of Community law must be adhered to, it would not itself determine the applicable law. This solution would therefore involve a mechanism very different from that of the other conflict rules and it might remain exceptional. In particular, EC directives do not yet cover all the aspects of consumer law, so protection via national law remains important;

ii. Maintenance of the current solution, but changing the conditions for application to include the mobile consumer and possibly the types of contracts currently excluded, on the grounds that the current solution is basically satisfactory, and that all that is needed is to enlarge its scope (point vi, infra);

iii. Generalisation of Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention, the law of the place of the business being applied in exchange for generalised application of the mandatory rules of the state of the consumer's residence: The EUROPEAN GROUPING OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW proposes applying Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention to consumer contracts, in combination with an extension of the rule currently provided for in Article 5(2). In practice this would mean that the consumer contract would be governed by the law of the place where the business is established, whether or not the parties choose it, but that the court would in either event apply the mandatory rules of protection of the law of the consumer's place of residence. This solution would have the advantage of making it easier for the supplier to foresee the applicable law. To further increase this foreseeability, the solution could be supplemented by a provision that the mandatory rules of law of the consumer's place of residence are applied provided the supplier is actually in a position to know where that is (point vii, infra). But this would increase the number of cases of dépeçage and the potential practical difficulties will have to be weighed up;

[64] One of the questions raised by the dépeçage mechanism is what happens when the consumer's protective provisions are more favourable in country B than in country A. The answer to this question depends on the view taken of consumer protection: does it consist of applying a law that is known to the consumer and therefore matches his legitimate expectations or a law which is actually more favourable to him?

iv. Options ii and iii require the identification of the "mandatory rules" of the consumer's habitual place of residence. For legal matters already harmonised at Community level, it was suggested that the consumer protection rules of the law chosen by the parties should apply (in general, the law of the place where the business is established). Only in matters not harmonised at EC level, the consumer should not be deprived of the protection through the "mandatory rules" of the law of the country of his habitual residence;

v. Systematic application of the law of the consumer's place of residence: This would be a neat and clear solution and would make it unnecessary to split the contract. This in turn would enhance certainty as to the law and would enable proceedings to be handled more quickly and more cheaply; both parties stand to gain. But here again, there is the question of the conditions for application of the rule (point vi, infra);

vi. With respect to solutions ii, iii or v, there will always be a need to examine the conditions of their application to make a distinction between consumers who are eligible for specific protection in cross-border transactions and those who are not.[65] The traditional approach, adopted in the Brussels Convention of 1968 and the Rome Convention, was to look at the question from the consumer's angle, withholding protection from those who had knowingly taken the "risk of foreign trade". But, as has already been seen, this criterion, requiring locating measures taken by the parties, is not well adapted to the era of the new distance selling techniques (Pay-TV, Internet). Another solution might be to analyse the conduct by the business to determine the conditions for application of the protective provisions of Article 5. Thus the future Rome I instrument could take as a starting point Article 15 of the Brussels I Regulation, which combines two conditions to decide whether a consumer is eligible for the protective rules[66]: firstly, that the business directs its activities towards the State of the consumer's residence and, secondly, that a contract is concluded at a distance within the framework of these activities. This Green Paper could also be the occasion to reflect on the need to introduce a Community definition of the expression to "direct an activity towards another State"; for instance, such definition could be composed of a range of facts.

vii. The introduction of elements involving the theory of appearance provides a variant on solution (vi), still with the objective of specifying the conditions for application of the consumer protection provisions. Thus a future instrument could provide that the place of 65 There are hypotheses in which the application of the consumer's law is not reasonably possible, for example when a Belgian tourist travelling in Portugal enters a local shop there and buys a video cassette that turns out to be defective.

66 Cf. statement by the Commission and the Council on Article 15 of the Brussels I Regulation (available at http://europa.eu.int/comm/justice_home/unit/civil/justciv_conseil/justciv_en.pdf), specifies that for the consumer protection provisions to be applicable, it is not sufficient for an undertaking to target its activities at the Member State of the consumer's residence; a contract must also be concluded within the framework of its activities. "... the mere fact that an Internet site is accessible is not sufficient for Article 15 to be applicable, although a factor will be that this Internet site solicits the conclusion of distance contracts and that a contract has actually been concluded at a distance, by whatever means. In this respect, the language or currency which a website uses does not constitute a relevant factor." The statement does not necessarily refer only to interactive sites: the aim of a site asking the visitor to send an order by fax is to conclude a distance contract. But a site does not aim to conclude a distance contract if, while addressing the consumers of the whole world with in the intention of providing information on a product, it then refers them to a local distributor for the purpose of signing a contract.

the consumer's residence would be a relevant factor only if the supplier was aware of it or should have been aware of it on the ground of the consumer's conduct. The supplier would be protected from the application of a foreign law if the consumer did not provide him with any means of knowing at least the country – but not necessarily the exact address – of his residence, on the understanding that it is for the supplier to give the consumer the opportunity to do so.[67] viii. A completely different approach would be not to distinguish any more between consumers which are eligible for specific protection and those who are not, but to introduce one single rule applicable to all consumers. For instance, a future instrument might permit, for all consumer contracts, the choice of a law which is not that of the consumer's habitual residence, but it would be a very limited choice, since the parties could only chose the law of the country where the business is established. For this choice being valid, it would be for the business to prove that the consumer made an informed choice and that he had advance information on all the rights and obligations conferred on him by that law (right of withdrawal, exchange of product, duration and terms of the guarantee, etc If the business failed to do so, the court would apply either the consumer's law or the mandatory provisions of that law. Such a solution, being justified by the existence of a Community minimum standard of consumer protection, would obviously be applicable only if the business was domiciled in a Member State. Non-Community businesses, in exchange for the choice of a law other than that of the consumer, would remain subject to its mandatory provisions and must accept the dépeçage of the contract;

Whatever the solution selected, it must be remembered that consumer disputes only seldom come before the courts, as they tend to be small claims. The question of the law applicable to a consumer contract should accordingly be seen in the context of current efforts both in the Member States and at the European Commission to encourage alternative, including electronic, dispute resolution procedures.[68]

Question 12: Evaluation of the consumer protection rules:

A. How do you evaluate the current rules on consumer protection? Are they still appropriate, in particular in the light of the development of electronic commerce?

B. Do you have information on the impact of the current rule on a) companies in general; b) small and medium-sized enterprises; c) consumers?

C. Among the proposed solutions, which do you prefer, and why? Are other solutions possible?

D. In your view, what would be the impact of the various possible solutions on a) companies in general; b) small and medium-sized enterprises; c) consumers?

[67] For a contract concluded via the Internet, for example, it is up to the business to make sure that its standard form enables it to identify the place of the consumer's residence.

[68] Cf. Green Paper on alternative dispute resolution in civil and commercial matters, COM(2002)196 (01).

3.2.8. Questions regarding the definition of the term "mandatory provisions"

3.2.8.1. The concept of mandatory provision covers a multiform reality

The Convention refers to the applicability of mandatory provisions in Articles 3(3), 5, 6, 7 and 9. What does this mean? In national law, there are numerous mandatory provisions designed to guarantee a country's social and economic order, also called "public policy" rules. The reference here is to rules from which the parties cannot derogate by contract, in particular those aiming to protect weaker parties (consumers, workers, authors in publishing contracts, minors, commercial agents).[69] However, in a contract subject to a foreign law, a weak party cannot automatically expect his own country's public policy provisions to apply unless the special rules of the Convention (Articles 5 and 6) so provide.

The mandatory provisions within the meaning of Article 7, also designated by the term "overriding rules" by English writers, are a different matter, and they are involved only in an international context: this involves provisions to which a state attaches such importance that it requires them to be applied whenever there is a connection between the legal situation and its territory, whatever law is otherwise applicable to the contract. What is special about the mandatory rules within the meaning of Article 7 is that the court does not even apply its conflict rules to see what law would be applicable and assess whether its content might be repugnant to the values of the forum[70] but automatically applies its own law. Article 7 does not enumerate overriding mandatory rules, each court must decide on the basis of its own legal system whether this or that provision is a mandatory rule within the meaning of Article 7, and the answer is not always obvious.

This difference can be illustrated by the French law on redundancy. This is indisputably an internal public policy law, which means that any contract between a French employer and a French employed whereby the employee waived his rights to redundancy pay or agreed to shorter than normal periods of notice without compensation would be null and void. On the other hand, the French courts have held that it is not an "overriding mandatory rule" within the meaning of Article 7, applicable whatever the law applicable to the contract.[71] Accordingly, a French employee whose employment contract is validly subject to a foreign law (point 3.2.9, infra) cannot expect French redundancy legislation to apply automatically.

3.2.8.2. Difficulties encountered

There are those[72] who express doubts about the combination between the mandatory provisions of Article 5 and those of Article 7: they argue that Article 5 is a special application of Article 7 as the two aim to displace the normally applicable law. Accordingly, when the conditions of Article 5 are not met, Article 7 would also be inoperative. This interpretation would deprive a mobile consumer, who already does not enjoy the protection of Article 5, of the safety valve offered by the public order acts. The German case law has followed the same line,[73] but most academic writers are sharply critical.

69 For example, in employment law, the rules concerning safety and health at work, minimum wages, paid leave or sick leave.

70 This is the public-policy exception, provided for by Article 16 of the Convention.

72 P. Lagarde, Cf. P. Lagarde, Le nouveau droit international privé des contrats après l'entrée en vigueur de la Convention de Rome du 19 juin 1980, RCDIP, 1991,316.

73 Bundesgerichtshof, 19 March 1997 (Case VIII ZR 316/96): German consumers travelling in the Canary Islands were induced by dubious practices to sign contracts for the purchase of a timeshare in a holiday

Generally, the use of the same expression for very different concepts generates confusion in the interpretation of the Convention.

3.2.8.3. Possible solutions

A future instrument could specify that the scope of the two Articles is not identical. Article 5 designates an objectively applicable law (in the circumstances that it defines) whose mandatory protective provisions (as defined by national law) must be complied with. But it does not interfere with the possible application of overriding mandatory rules, provided for by Article 7 as regards laws which regard their provisions as internationally mandatory and which can thus provide complementary protection when their conditions for application in geographical terms are satisfied.

The future Rome I instrument could therefore propose a definition of the concept of mandatory rules within the meaning of Article 7, based on the decision of the Court of Justice in Arblade,[74] according to which this term means "national provisions compliance with which has been deemed to be so crucial for the protection of the political, social or economic order in the Member State concerned as to require compliance therewith by all persons present on the national territory of that Member State and all legal relationships within that State."

In response to the Court's decision in Ingmar GB Ltd v Eaton Loenard Technologies Inc.,[75] some have also suggested specifying in the future instrument that there cannot be mandatory provision within the meaning of Article 7 when a rule aims only to protect purely private interests, as opposed to legislation protecting the state's political, economic or social order.

According to the Ingmar decision, not only national provisions but also provisions of Community legislation may be mandatory within the meaning of Article 7. This idea could be incorporated into a future "Rome I" instrument, along the lines of Article 11 (3) of the draft proposal for a Council Regulation on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations ("Rome II").[76] apartment. The contracts - some subject to the law of the Isle of Man, others to Spanish law - contained a non-withdrawal clause although withdrawal was possible in German law and Community law. When they returned to Germany, certain tourists wished nevertheless to exercise the right of withdrawal provided for by German law. Being eligible as "mobile" consumers for the consumer protection measures of Article 5, the lower courts argued that the right of withdrawal under German law was conferred by public-order legislation within the meaning of Article 7(2) of the Convention. This argument was rejected by the Supreme Court on the ground that German law could be applied under Article 7 only if the conditions as to connection with the territory provided for by Article 5(2) for contracts governed by this Article were met. Consumer protection in such a case is now given by Community sectoral Directives.

Question 13: Should a future Rome I instrument specify the meaning of "mandatory provisions" in Articles 3, 5, 6 and 9 and in Article 7?

3.2.9. Uncertainties relating to the interpretation of "temporary employment" of employees in Article 6

3.2.9.1. The law applicable to employment contract

Out of the same concern for workers' protection as for consumers, the authors of the Convention derogated from the general rules of Articles 3 and 4. Article 6(1) is built on the same model as the first subparagraph of Article 5(2): freedom of choice is not abolished, which is not negligible for contracts negotiated by managers. This freedom is limited, however, in that the choice of another law than that which would be objectively applicable in the absence of a choice cannot have the effect of depriving the worker of the protection enjoyed under the mandatory provisions of the objectively applicable law.

But the spirit behind the determination of the objectively applicable law in Article 6(2) is different from Article 5: while for Article 5, the applicable law is that of the consumer's residence, which is the law that the consumer generally knows and on the protection of which he relies, Article 6(2) tries to determine the law with which the contract is most closely connected. It distinguishes according to whether the worker habitually carries out his work under the contract in the same country or not.

In the first case, the law of the country in which the worker habitually carries out his work is applicable. The Article specifies that this is also the case when the worker "is temporarily employed in another country": the law applicable to the contract of a worker sent abroad for a given duration or for the needs of a specific job does not change, whereas expatriation entails the application of the law of the new country as that is now the country in which the worker habitually carries out his work.

When, on the other hand, the worker does not habitually carry out his work in the same country,[77] the applicable law is that of "the country in which the place of business through which he was engaged is situated".

In both cases, whether or not the worker habitually carries out his work in the same country, the objective connection defined by the Convention can be overridden by an exception clause (end of Article (2)), which for the worker avoids the harmful consequences of rigid connection of the contract to the law of the place of performance.[78]

3.2.9.2. Difficulties encountered

Practitioners and academic writers generally consider that the rules of Article 6 are relatively well drafted. Consequently, the decided cases tend to focus on the circumstances of the case, often complex and open to interpretation. But there are a few difficulties that should be pointed out. First there are those already referred to in relation to Articles 3, 4 and 5, pertaining in particular to determination of the tacit choice, to frequent use of the exception clause and the interaction between the mandatory provisions provided for in Article 6 and the public-order legislation referred to in Article 7, to which we will not return here.

77 Examples would include a worker in a mobile construction crew and a sales agent active in several States.

78 For example, a contract concluded in France between a French employer and a French employee for a two-year work in an African country, possibly with the promise of further employment in France on the expiry of the contract, can be assumed to be governed by the law not of the African country of the place of performance but by French law, with which it is most closely connected.

Close attention must be paid, on the other hand, to the "temporary employment" concept. For one thing, an analysis of the decided cases reveals that the definition of "temporary" raises problems in private international law, and for another, account must be taken of the definition of "posting" in Directive 1996/71 of 16 December 1996.

To begin with the private international law angle, the Convention leaves it to the court to determine the duration beyond which employment ceases to be temporary. Solutions are thus not easily foreseeable and can vary from country to country. However, this absence of rigidity regarding the applicable law also enables the court to take have fuller regard to the facts of the case, as "temporary employment" can refer to a great variety of situations. Temporary employment within a group of companies raises questions. What happens when the worker is sent to a company in the same group, with which he concludes a local employment contract? Sometimes, the companies of a group enjoy genuine autonomy and it may be that the transfer really corresponds to a new contract. In other situations, the worker is engaged by the management of the group before being transferred by decision of the same management; the new contract then corresponds merely to administrative requirements (need to obtain a work permit, for example).

To continue with the link with the directive on "posting of workers",[79] Article 6 brings our attention back to the question of the interaction between the general conflict rule of the Rome Convention and the rule affecting the applicable law in the sectoral Directive. Apart from being difficult for practitioners wishing to identify the applicable law, the two instruments do not use the same terminology.

The purpose of Directive 96/71 is to guarantee that certain mandatory provisions of the host Member State are applied in the event of an employee being sent to work there temporarily. This particularly concerns minimum wage regulations but also health and safety requirements. A superficial reading might suggest that the Directive does not follow the same logic as the Convention, Article 6 of which stipulates that the employee's status does not have to be changed because of a temporary assignment. But it is clear from a more detailed analysis that the two instruments sit well together. In the event of a temporary assignment, the Directive by no means aims to amend the law applicable to the employment contract but determines a "focal point" of mandatory rules to be complied with throughout the period of assignment to the host Member State, "whatever the law applicable to the working relationship". The Directive must therefore be regarded as an implementation of Article 7 of the Rome Convention, concerning overriding mandatory rules". The instrument thus aims to guaranty faire competition and the respect for employees' rights on the labour market in the Union.[80]

There is a risk of confusion in that the two instruments do not use the same terminology.

Article 1(3) of the Directive 96/71 specifies that its rules apply provided there is an employment relationship between the undertaking making the posting and the worker during the period of posting. From the moment the employee concludes a new employment contract, there is no posting in the sense of the Directive. But it has been seen that for the purposes of the Convention, on the contrary, there can be a temporary assignment even if the employee concludes a new employment contract in the host country, for example within a group of companies. For the purpose of the Convention it is the criterion of duration which decides whether the employee finds himself in the situation of "temporary assignment" in the sense of Article 6, whereas the criterion of duration is not relevant for the purposes of the Directive.

80 It must be remembered that the rules of the Directive also apply to the non-Community workers and employers, so that there is no differentiated treatment according to whether the sending company is established in a Member State or not. The text specifies that companies established in a non-member state may not be treated more favourably than companies established in a Member State. Accordingly the legislation of Member States transposing the Directive applies without discrimination to workers seconded to their territory whatever the country of origin of the worker or of the employer.

The Rome Convention and the Directive not having the same objectives, there is no inconsistency between these instruments. However, the present situation does not add to the transparency of Community legislation.

3.2.9.3. Possible solutions

To ensure that the duration of the temporary assignment for the purposes of Article 6 of the Rome Convention is not assessed on a purely case by case basis, thus creating an unforeseeable solution, several solutions can be envisaged:

i. appraisal of the assignment's temporary nature in the light of the intention of the parties, in that an assignment planned for a given duration or a given project would be temporary. This solution, which would mean that the duration of the assignment was assessed ex ante, has been proposed by the EUROPEAN GROUPING OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW;

ii. another solution would be for the court to assess the duration ex post, on the basis of the actual duration, on a case by case basis, possibly on the basis of a period set by a future instrument. The EUROPEAN GROUPING OF PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW stresses, however, that this step, though having the advantage of foreseeability, would inevitably be arbitrary and probably too rigid in view of the diversity of situations;

iii. the Convention could further specify that a new contract concluded with an employer of the same group does not exclude this being considered as a temporary assignment.

Question 14: Should Article 6 be clarified as regards the definition of "temporary employment" ? If so, how?

3.2.10. Other questions concerning Article 6

The Convention does not specify the position of employees carrying out their work at a place not subject to national sovereignty (sailors, pilots). The courts tend to prefer the law of the place where the employee was engaged rather than locating somewhat artificially the place where work is carried out in one country or another.

Certain Member States have special rules, sometimes unilateral, that are detrimental to uniformity of solutions (for example, a conflict rule designating the law of the flag for sailors on board ship).

One could also question the relevance of the connection of the contract to the law of the place of performance of the work in the case of cross-border home-working. Its connection to the place where the interests of the employing business are located or to the place where the work is delivered might, under certain circumstances, be more protective[81] of the employee's interests. It seems that the last paragraph of Article 6 permits the connection of the contract to these latter laws, but some academic writers suggest this Article should contain more precise indications with respect of the country with which "the contract is most closely connected" to expressly mention the situation of home-working.

Question 15: Do you think that Article 6 should be amended on other points?

3.2.11. Application of foreign mandatory rules (Article 7(1))

In addition to applying the overriding mandatory rules of the forum (point 3.2.8, supra), the Convention sometimes allows the court to give effect to mandatory rules of other countries with which the situation is closely connected, including states which are not members of the European Union. This is a highly innovatory provision, expressing the concern of the Member States to respect the legislative policy of other states, including non-member countries. Foreign overriding mandatory rules can be applicable in a variety of situations. By way of example, there is a Decision of the House of Lords of 1958 which had regard to Indian legislation prohibiting jute exports to South Africa in a case concerning a contract governed by English law.[82]

There have so far been very few court decisions on Article 7(1).

Article 22(1) of the Convention stipulates that Member States not wishing to adopt Article 7(1) relating to foreign overriding mandatory rules may reserve the right not to apply it, and the United Kingdom, Luxembourg and Germany have actually done so. This does not preclude the courts there from taking foreign mandatory rules into account, but they would then be acting outside the Convention and the additional details that it contains.

Should the Rome Convention be converted into a Community instrument, and if so may be even into a regulation which would not be compatible with reservations, the question of the future of this Article will have to be addressed

Question 16: Do you believe there should be rules concerning foreign mandatory rules in the meaning of Article 7? Would it be desirable for the future instrument to be more precise on the conditions for applying such rules?

3.2.12. Law applicable to formal validity of contracts (Article 9)

3.2.12.1.Current solution

The form of the contract means any external behaviour imposed by law on the author of a legal transaction, such as the requirement of a written document, a hand-written endorsement or a deed. To encourage the validity of the contract as to form, the Convention lays down an alternative rule: it is enough for the measure to be valid according to one of two laws – the law applicable as to substance, determined in accordance with the general rules of the

81 For instance, in case of application of the rules of the country where the business is established regarding collective dismissal, the protection of employees' rights in case of business transfer or bankruptcy of the business.

82 Regazzoni v Sethia 1958 [AC] 301. The court does not seem to have referred specifically to the concept of foreign public-order legislation, as the case substantially predated the Rome Convention, but the situation was precisely the kind of situation to which Article 7(1) applies.

Convention, and the law of the place where the contract was concluded. As regards contracts concluded at a distance (by fax, mail or e-mail, for example), there is a place of conclusion for each party in the contract, which further multiplies the chances that the contract is valid as to form. This solution has made it unnecessary to take a more or less artificial decision on the location of a contract between distant parties.

3.2.12.2. Difficulties encountered

Article 9 was thought up before contracts concluded by e-mail had become common practice. But how is the place of conclusion to be determined for each party, this being one of the branches of the alternative proposed when offer and acceptance are done by a simple exchange of e-mails?

3.2.12.3. Possible solutions

It might be possible to provide a subsidiary rule where it is not possible to determine the place where the contractual intention was expressed. The alternative rule in Article 9 could contain an additional branch by adding the law of the habitual residence of the author of the statement of intention to contract to the law governing it as to substance and the law of the place of conclusion. It will be enough, therefore, for the statement to satisfy the formal requirements of one of the three laws to be valid as to form. This rule will apply without discrimination to contracts concluded by electronic means and to other contracts concluded at a distance.

Question 17: Do you think that the conflict rule on form should be modernised?

3.2.13. Law applicable to the voluntary assignment of legal rights (Article 12)

3.2.13.1. Current solution

Assignment is a mechanism widely used, in particular in banking practice, for carrying out various credit or factoring operations. There is an agreement whereby a creditor, called the assignor, transfers his claim against his debtor, called the assigned debtor, to a contractor, called the assignee. An example might be a parts supplier (the "assignor") who has claims on his own customers, the car manufacturers (the "assigned debtors"). Instead of waiting for manufacturers to pay him, the supplier assigns these claims to his bank (the "assignee") to obtain the amounts on his invoices immediately.

Like any triangular operation, assignment raises many questions in private international law since there are three distinct legal relations, each of which can be subject to its own law. In the above example, the first contractual link chronologically is between the parts supplier and the car manufacturers. It is this claim, called the "original claim" that will subsequently be assigned. It is subject to its own law, determined in accordance with Articles 3 (freedom of choice) and 4 (closest connection) of the Convention.

The "assignment contract" or "transfer contract" is then made between the assignor, in our example the parts supplier, and the assignee, here the bank. According to Article 12(1) of the Convention, the applicable law is again determined in accordance with the general rules of the Convention (Articles 3 and 4). In the absence of a choice,[83] the applicable law is often

[83] Some writers argue that an assignment contract contains a tacit choice for the law of the claim assigned. This solution has the advantage of submitting the claim and the assignment to the same law. On the therefore that of the assignee, who provides the characteristic performance.[84] The third legal relationship is between the assigned debtor, in our example the car manufacturer, and the assignee bank. According to the Convention, this contract is governed by the same law as the original claim. Thus the Convention aims to protect the assigned debtor by ensuring that his obligations remain governed by the same law, the only one which can reasonably be expected, and that he does not owe the bank more than he owed the supplier.

3.2.13.2 Difficulties encountered

The Rome Convention does not deal explicitly with the question under which conditions the assignment can be invoked against third parties. The question is important because it determines the effectiveness of the assignment of the claim and the transfer of the property. It may happen, in the example aforementioned, that the parts supplier did not pay his own creditor, who then wishes to seize his assets and claims, including the claims which were assigned to the bank. The question then arises who – the new creditor or the bank – owns the relevant claims. The supplier may also have assigned his claims to two different banks to obtain credit fraudulently. The question is then which of the two banks owns the claims.[85] Since the Member States do not all answer these questions in the same way, it would be preferable for them to apply the same law to discourage forum-shopping.

But as neither the Convention nor the Bankruptcy Regulation[86] enacts conflict rules explicitly covering the question of the conditions under which the assignments can be invoked against third parties, each Member State applies its own rules here, and the solution varies widely from one court to another. The disparities are all the more marked as the courts of certain Member States consider that, while the question is not treated explicitly by the Convention, it nevertheless contains implicit rules.

3.2.13.3 Possible solutions

The future instrument could specify the law applicable to the question of assignments being invoked against third parties. Several options are possible:

i. application of Article 12(1) (application of the same law as to the transfer contract): this solution has been adopted by the Dutch courts.[87] It has unquestionable advantages in legal systems which do not usually distinguish between the validity of the transfer contract and the effectiveness of the transfer of ownership of the claim; other hand, in the event of a multiple assignment, this solution is likely to submit the assignments between assignor and assignee to different laws even though they are a single business operation.

84 In certain complex operations, for example a large-scale credit operation, the characteristic performance could also be that of the assignee. The Convention therefore leaves certain room for manoeuvre so that the courts can take account of specific situations.

85 In more technical terms, what this question boils down to is whether the Convention covers only the contract law aspects or whether it also includes the property law aspects (what law determines the question whether the measures of information for the debtor serve only to protect him or also to make the transfer of property effective).

86 Regulation (EC) No 1346/2000 of 29 May 2000 relating to insolvency proceedings, which came into force on 31 May 2002. This Regulation does not contain conflict rules, but Article 5 establishes that a insolvency proceeding initiated in a Member State does not affect rights in rem in assets located in other Member States. These rights in rem include "the exclusive right to have a claim met" (Article 5(2)(b)). It must be specified that according to Article 2(g) of the Regulation, a claim is located "in the Member State within the territory of which the third party required to meet them has the centre of his main interests".

87 Hoge Raad, 16 May 1997, Nederlands International Privatrecht 1997, No 209.

ii. application of Article 12(1) (application of the same law as to the original claim): this was the solution in the preliminary draft Convention but not in the final text. It is also the solution applied by the German courts.[88] The position here is that the fate of third parties in general, such as a creditor of the transferor or a second assignee of the same claim, should not be dissociated from that of the assigned debtor; the law applicable to the question whether the contract can be pleaded would be the same in both cases, ensuring a degree of consistency in the treatment of the assignment operation as a whole;

iii. application of the law of the place of residence of the assignment debtor: since the assignor's creditors are not always familiar with the law applicable to the original claim, some propose that the question whether the contract can be pleaded should be governed by the law of the place of residence of the assignment debtor. This solution has the advantage that third parties will be familiar with this law, but it would further complicate the multiple business credit assignments when debtors are resident abroad, a single business operation being subject to several laws;

iv. application of the law of the assignor's residence: this is the solution best capable of satisfying the criterion of foreseeability for third parties. Thus was this solution adopted by the United Nations Convention on the assignment of claims in international trade;[89]

v. all the solutions except point (ii) have the disadvantage of making the question whether the assignment can be invoked against the assigned debtor and against other third parties subject to different laws, which could in certain circumstances lead to deadlock. It has therefore been suggested that there might be a material rule giving priority to whoever brings the first action while taking into account the good or bad faith of the competing creditors.

Question 18: Do you believe that a future instrument should specify the law applicable to the conditions under which the assignment may be invoked against third parties ? If so, what conflict rule do you recommend?

3.2.14. Respective scope of Articles 12 and 13 relating to the assignment of claims and subrogation

3.2.14.1. Subrogation in the Rome Convention

This is a mechanism which is not known in all the Member States. As in the case of assignment, it involves a triangular operation transferring an obligation. There is subrogation where a person paying a creditor acquires his rights and becomes the debtor's creditor in his place. There can be either a contract between the parties or a legal provision which automatically activates it in relation to certain measures. The Rome Convention does not cover liberalities, but only subrogation payments made by a third party under the terms of an obligation. The question whether this third party is then subrogated to the creditor's rights is theoretically governed by the same law as this obligation (Article 13).[90]

88 Bundesgerichtshof, 8 December 1998, XI ZR 302/97, IPRAX, 2000, p. 124.

89 Adopted by the General Assembly on 31 January 2002. This Convention has not yet been signed or ratified by any of the Member States. It does not provide for an "opt-out" mechanism for Article 22 concerning the possibility of relying on the assignment against third parties, contrary to the other conflict rules.

90 A payment made by a guarantor is a typical case of subrogation and it is therefore the law of the contract of guarantee which governs subrogation.

3.2.14.2. Difficulties encountered

There is an important business law mechanism, factoring, called contractual subrogation in certain countries and credit transfer in others. Since there are conflicts of terminology, it has not been possible to apply the Convention uniformly. In addition, some writers argue that Article 13 applies only to the subrogation by operation of law, contractual subrogation being covered by Article 12.

Since the rules of Articles 12 and 13 are very similar, it is not clear whether the conflict of terminology has any real practical effect. But the question remains whether there is a clear rule that is easy for the practitioner to apply.

Lastly, some would like subrogation payments made in the absence of an obligation to be within the scope of the Convention.

3.2.14.3. Possible solutions

The future Rome I instrument could specify the respective scope of Articles 12 and 13. Another solution would be to merge Articles 12 and 13. In the absence of a clear provision, the question will be settled by the Court of Justice.

Question 19: Would it be useful to specify the respective scope of Articles 12 and 13? Do you believe that there should be a conflict rule for subrogation payments made in the absence of an obligation?

3.2.15. Absence of conflict rule relating to offsetting of claims

3.2.15.1. The offsetting mechanism

The offsetting mechanism means that when two parties are each other's creditor and debtor, their respective debts are reduced to the amount of the smallest one. For example, if Paul owes Peter €20 and Peter owes Paul €10, the offsetting mechanism operates automatically so that Peter is released from his debt and Paul owes Peter €10. This is a mechanism for extinguishing obligations and is of great importance in daily business life.

Offsetting may be either by operation of law (legal offsetting), when certain conditions are met, or by the desire for the parties (contractual offsetting).[91]

3.2.15.2. Difficulties encountered

Under Article 10(d) of the Convention, the various methods of extinguishing obligations, of which offsetting is one, are governed by the same law as the relevant obligation. But this provision does not reflect the difficulties inherent in the legal offsetting mechanism applied to two obligations subject to different laws. Here each Member State would apply its own conflict rule. As these rules differ, there is uncertainty as to the law in this matter.

3.2.15.3. Possible solutions

The Convention could specify the law applicable to legal offsetting:

[91] For contractual offsetting, the applicable law is determined in accordance with the general rules of the Convention (Article 3 and 4).

i. cumulative application of the two laws involved: this rule protects the interests of the parties but is very restrictive;

ii. application of the law which governs the credit to be offset.

The Bankruptcy Regulation,[92] which entered into force on 31 May 2002, contains no conflict rules concerning offsetting as such, but even so it has an impact on this question. Article 6 treats offsetting in the same way as Article 5 treats assignments: when, under the normally applicable conflict rules, the right to offset is subject to a different national law from the insolvency procedure, Article 6 enables the creditor to preserve this possibility as an acquired right in the insolvency procedure. But the Convention gives it only if offsetting is allowed by the law applicable to the claim by the insolvent debtor (passive credit) and thus opts for the solution (ii) above.

These rules apply, obviously, only where offsetting is invoked in an insolvency proceeding and leave open the question of the applicable law in other circumstances.

Question 20: In your view, would it be useful to specify the law applicable to legal compensation? If so, what conflict rule do you recommend?

Annex 1

Private international law: a glossary

Applicable law/lex causae:	When a legal relationship between private individuals has an international character (for example, because they are of different nationality, do not reside in the same country, are parties to an international commercial transaction, etc), it is necessary to determine which of the laws involved govern the situation. The applicable law is determined according to the conflict rules.
Bilateral conflict rule:	Most of the rules of conflict of laws are bilateral, i.e. they can designate either a foreign law or the law of the forum. For example, there is a French rule according to which the court must determine a child's affiliation on the basis of the law of the mother's nationality. If the mother is French, the French court will apply French law; if she is Italian, it will apply Italian law. The bilateral conflict rules are opposed to unilateral rules.
Dépeçage:	Situation in which different parts of an international contract are governed by the laws of several states (for example, a sales contract may be governed by German law except for the guarantee clause, which is governed by English law).
Domestic public policy:	A set of mandatory national rules the objective of which is to guarantee the social and economic order of a state. This concerns rules from which parties cannot derogate by contract, for example those aiming to protect weaker parties (consumers, workers, minors, etc).
Forum:	The court to which an international dispute was referred.
Forum-shopping:	The attitude of a person involved in an international dispute who takes his case to the court of a particular country not because it is best placed to hear the dispute but only because, under its rules on conflict of laws, it would apply the law giving the most advantageous result for this person.
Freedom of choice:	The right of private individuals to choose the law applicable to their legal situation.
International jurisdiction:	When a dispute is international (for example, because the parties are of different nationalities or do not reside in the same country), several courts may have jurisdiction in the same case. The rules of international jurisdiction determine the country whose courts have jurisdiction in a given dispute.

International public policy:	After having determined the law applicable to a given legal situation in accordance with its conflict rules, the court may consider that the application of this law entails a result not compatible with the values of the forum. Accordingly, it rules out the normally applicable foreign law and applies its own law.
Mandatory provision:	In the Rome Convention, the expression "mandatory provision" covers multiple realities: it designates at the same time overriding mandatory rules in the meaning of Article 7, a concept specific to private international law, and public-policy rules of national law.
Overriding mandatory rule:	Cf. Article 7 of the Convention. Concept of private international law which designates the provisions to which a state attaches such importance that it requires them to be applied wherever the legal situation is connected with its territory, whatever law is otherwise applicable to the situation. Unlike the mechanism of the international public-policy exception, the court does not look to its conflict rules to ascertain the applicable law and evaluate whether its content may be incompatible with the system of values of the forum but automatically applies its own rules.
Rule of conflict of laws:	When a legal relation one between private individuals has an international element, the laws of several countries can compete with each other to govern the situation. To decide which of the laws involved applies to this situation, the courts apply the conflict rules.
Substantial law:	Substantial law is opposed to the private international law of a state. It means the national rules determining the rights and obligations of a person in a given legal situation (for example, the rule that there cannot be a contract if the assent of one of the parties was vitiated).
Unilateral conflict rule:	According to the unilateralist method, each state is satisfied with determining the cases where its own law is applicable. Such rules are the exception nowadays. An example is Article 3 subparagraph 3 of the French Civil Code: "the laws on the status and capacity of persons govern French persons, even those residing abroad" (but this rule is "bilateralised" by the case law).

Regulation (EC) No 864/2007 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 July 2007 on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II)

of 11 July 2007

on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II)

THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION,

Having regard to the Treaty establishing the European Community, and in particular Articles 61(c) and 67 thereof,

Having regard to the proposal from the Commission,

Having regard to the opinion of the European Economic and Social Committee [1],

Acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 251 of the Treaty in the light of the joint text approved by the Conciliation Committee on 25 June 2007 [2],

Whereas:

(1) The Community has set itself the objective of maintaining and developing an area of freedom, security and justice. For the progressive establishment of such an area, the Community is to adopt measures relating to judicial cooperation in civil matters with a cross-border impact to the extent necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market.

(2) According to Article 65(b) of the Treaty, these measures are to include those promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws and of jurisdiction.

(3) The European Council meeting in Tampere on 15 and 16 October 1999 endorsed the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and other decisions of judicial authorities as the cornerstone of judicial cooperation in civil matters and invited the Council and the Commission to adopt a programme of measures to implement the principle of mutual recognition.

(4) On 30 November 2000, the Council adopted a joint Commission and Council programme of measures for implementation of the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in civil and commercial matters [3]. The programme identifies measures relating to the harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules as those facilitating the mutual recognition of judgments.

(5) The Hague Programme [4], adopted by the European Council on 5 November 2004, called for work to be pursued actively on the rules of conflict of laws regarding non-contractual obligations (Rome II).

(6) The proper functioning of the internal market creates a need, in order to improve the predictability of the outcome of litigation, certainty as to the law applicable and the free movement of judgments, for the conflict-of-law rules in the Member States to designate the same national law irrespective of the country of the court in which an action is brought.

(7) The substantive scope and the provisions of this Regulation should be consistent with Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters [5] (Brussels I) and the instruments dealing with the law applicable to contractual obligations.

(8) This Regulation should apply irrespective of the nature of the court or tribunal seised.

(9) Claims arising out of acta iure imperii should include claims against officials who act on behalf of the State and liability for acts of public authorities, including liability of publicly appointed office-holders. Therefore, these matters should be excluded from the scope of this Regulation.

(10) Family relationships should cover parentage, marriage, affinity and collateral relatives. The reference in Article 1(2) to relationships having comparable effects to marriage and other family relationships should be interpreted in accordance with the law of the Member State in which the court is seised.

(11) The concept of a non-contractual obligation varies from one Member State to another. Therefore for the purposes of this Regulation non-contractual obligation should be understood as an autonomous concept. The conflict-of-law rules set out in this Regulation should also cover non-contractual obligations arising out of strict liability.

(12) The law applicable should also govern the question of the capacity to incur liability in tort/delict.

(13) Uniform rules applied irrespective of the law they designate may avert the risk of distortions of competition between Community litigants.

(14) The requirement of legal certainty and the need to do justice in individual cases are essential elements of an area of justice. This Regulation provides for the connecting factors which are the most appropriate to achieve these objectives. Therefore, this Regulation provides for a general rule but also for specific rules and, in certain provisions, for an "escape clause" which allows a departure from these rules where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the tort/delict is manifestly more closely connected with another country. This set of rules thus creates a flexible framework of conflict-of-law rules. Equally, it enables the court seised to treat individual cases in an appropriate manner.

(15) The principle of the lex loci delicti commissi is the basic solution for non-contractual obligations in virtually all the Member States, but the practical application of the principle where the component factors of the case are spread over several countries varies. This situation engenders uncertainty as to the law applicable.

(16) Uniform rules should enhance the foreseeability of court decisions and ensure a reasonable balance between the interests of the person claimed to be liable and the person who has sustained damage. A connection with the country where the direct damage occurred (lex loci damni) strikes a fair balance between the interests of the person claimed to be liable and the person sustaining the damage, and also reflects the modern approach to civil liability and the development of systems of strict liability.

(17) The law applicable should be determined on the basis of where the damage occurs, regardless of the country or countries in which the indirect consequences could occur. Accordingly, in cases of personal injury or damage to property, the country in which the damage occurs should be the country where the injury was sustained or the property was damaged respectively.

(18) The general rule in this Regulation should be the lex loci damni provided for in Article 4(1). Article 4(2) should be seen as an exception to this general principle, creating a special connection where the parties have their habitual residence in the same country. Article 4(3) should be understood as an escape clause' from Article 4(1) and (2), where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the tort/delict is manifestly more closely connected with another country.

(19) Specific rules should be laid down for special torts/delicts where the general rule does not allow a reasonable balance to be struck between the interests at stake.

(20) The conflict-of-law rule in matters of product liability should meet the objectives of fairly spreading the risks inherent in a modern high-technology society, protecting consumers' health, stimulating innovation, securing undistorted competition and facilitating trade. Creation of a cascade system of connecting factors, together with a foreseeability clause, is a balanced solution in regard to these objectives. The first element to be taken into account is the law of the country in which the person sustaining the damage had his or her habitual residence when the damage occurred, if the product was marketed in that country. The other elements of the cascade are triggered if the product was not marketed in that country, without prejudice to Article 4(2) and to the possibility of a manifestly closer connection to another country.

(21) The special rule in Article 6 is not an exception to the general rule in Article 4(1) but rather a clarification of it. In matters of unfair competition, the conflict-of-law rule should protect competitors, consumers and the general public and ensure that the market economy functions properly. The connection to the law of the country where competitive relations or the collective interests of consumers are, or are likely to be, affected generally satisfies these objectives.

(22) The non-contractual obligations arising out of restrictions of competition in Article 6(3) should cover infringements of both national and Community competition law. The law applicable to such non-contractual obligations should be the law of the country where the market is, or is likely to be, affected. In cases where the market is, or is likely to be, affected in more than one country, the claimant should be able in certain circumstances to choose to base his or her claim on the law of the court seised.

(23) For the purposes of this Regulation, the concept of restriction of competition should cover prohibitions on agreements between undertakings, decisions by associations of undertakings and concerted practices which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition within a Member State or within the internal market, as well as prohibitions on the abuse of a dominant position within a Member State or within the internal market, where such agreements, decisions, concerted practices or abuses are prohibited by Articles 81 and 82 of the Treaty or by the law of a Member State.

(24) "Environmental damage" should be understood as meaning adverse change in a natural resource, such as water, land or air, impairment of a function performed by that resource for the benefit of another natural resource or the public, or impairment of the variability among living organisms.

(25) Regarding environmental damage, Article 174 of the Treaty, which provides that there should be a high level of protection based on the precautionary principle and the principle that preventive action should be taken, the principle of priority for corrective action at source and the principle that the polluter pays, fully justifies the use of the principle of discriminating in favour of the person sustaining the damage. The question of when the person seeking compensation can make the choice of the law applicable should be determined in accordance with the law of the Member State in which the court is seised.

(26) Regarding infringements of intellectual property rights, the universally acknowledged principle of the lex loci protectionis should be preserved. For the purposes of this Regulation, the term intellectual property rights' should be interpreted as meaning, for instance, copyright, related rights, the sui generis right for the protection of databases and industrial property rights.

(27) The exact concept of industrial action, such as strike action or lock-out, varies from one Member State to another and is governed by each Member State's internal rules. Therefore, this Regulation assumes as a general principle that the law of the country where the industrial action was taken should apply, with the aim of protecting the rights and obligations of workers and employers.

(28) The special rule on industrial action in Article 9 is without prejudice to the conditions relating to the exercise of such action in accordance with national law and without prejudice to the legal status of trade unions or of the representative organisations of workers as provided for in the law of the Member States.

(29) Provision should be made for special rules where damage is caused by an act other than a tort/delict, such as unjust enrichment, negotiorum gestio and culpa in contrahendo.

(30) Culpa in contrahendo for the purposes of this Regulation is an autonomous concept and should not necessarily be interpreted within the meaning of national law. It should include the violation of the duty of disclosure and the breakdown of contractual negotiations. Article 12 covers only non-contractual obligations presenting a direct link with the dealings prior to the conclusion of a contract. This means that if, while a contract is being negotiated, a person suffers personal injury, Article 4 or other relevant provisions of this Regulation should apply.

(31) To respect the principle of party autonomy and to enhance legal certainty, the parties should be allowed to make a choice as to the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation. This choice should be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the circumstances of the case. Where establishing the existence of the agreement, the court has to respect the intentions of the parties. Protection should be given to weaker parties by imposing certain conditions on the choice.

(32) Considerations of public interest justify giving the courts of the Member States the possibility, in exceptional circumstances, of applying exceptions based on public policy and overriding mandatory provisions. In particular, the application of a provision of the law designated by this Regulation which would have the effect of causing non-compensatory exemplary or punitive damages of an excessive nature to be awarded may, depending on the circumstances of the case and the legal order of the Member State of the court seised, be regarded as being contrary to the public policy (ordre public) of the forum.

(33) According to the current national rules on compensation awarded to victims of road traffic accidents, when quantifying damages for personal injury in cases in which the accident takes place in a State other than that of the habitual residence of the victim, the court seised should take into account all the relevant actual circumstances of the specific victim, including in particular the actual losses and costs of after-care and medical attention.

(34) In order to strike a reasonable balance between the parties, account must be taken, in so far as appropriate, of the rules of safety and conduct in operation in the country in which the harmful act was committed, even where the non-contractual obligation is governed by the law of another country. The term "rules of safety and conduct" should be interpreted as referring to all regulations having any relation to safety and conduct, including, for example, road safety rules in the case of an accident.

(35) A situation where conflict-of-law rules are dispersed among several instruments and where there are differences between those rules should be avoided. This Regulation, however, does not exclude the possibility of inclusion of conflict-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations in provisions of Community law with regard to particular matters.

This Regulation should not prejudice the application of other instruments laying down provisions designed to contribute to the proper functioning of the internal market in so far as they cannot be applied in conjunction with the law designated by the rules of this Regulation. The application of provisions of the applicable law designated by the rules of this Regulation should not restrict the free movement of goods and services as regulated by Community instruments, such as Directive 2000/31/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 8 June 2000 on certain legal aspects of information society services, in particular electronic commerce, in the Internal Market (Directive on electronic commerce) [6].

(36) Respect for international commitments entered into by the Member States means that this Regulation should not affect international conventions to which one or more Member States are parties at the time this Regulation is adopted. To make the rules more accessible, the Commission should publish the list of the relevant conventions in the Official Journal of the European Union on the basis of information supplied by the Member States.

(37) The Commission will make a proposal to the European Parliament and the Council concerning the procedures and conditions according to which Member States would be entitled to negotiate and conclude on their own behalf agreements with third countries in individual and exceptional cases, concerning sectoral matters, containing provisions on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations.

(38) Since the objective of this Regulation cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States, and can therefore, by reason of the scale and effects of this Regulation, be better achieved at Community level, the Community may adopt measures, in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity set out in Article 5 of the Treaty. In accordance with the principle of proportionality set out in that Article, this Regulation does not go beyond what is necessary to attain that objective.

(39) In accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland annexed to the Treaty on European Union and to the Treaty establishing the European Community, the United Kingdom and Ireland are taking part in the adoption and application of this Regulation.

(40) In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and to the Treaty establishing the European Community, Denmark does not take part in the adoption of this Regulation, and is not bound by it or subject to its application,

HAVE ADOPTED THIS REGULATION:

CHAPTER I

SCOPE

Article 1

Scope

1. This Regulation shall apply, in situations involving a conflict of laws, to non-contractual obligations in civil and commercial matters. It shall not apply, in particular, to revenue, customs or administrative matters or to the liability of the State for acts and omissions in the exercise of State authority (acta iure imperii).

2. The following shall be excluded from the scope of this Regulation:

(a) non-contractual obligations arising out of family relationships and relationships deemed by the law applicable to such relationships to have comparable effects including maintenance obligations;

2. This Regulation shall apply also to non-contractual obligations that are likely to arise.

3. Any reference in this Regulation to:

(a) an event giving rise to damage shall include events giving rise to damage that are likely to occur; and

(b) damage shall include damage that is likely to occur.

Article 3

Universal application

Any law specified by this Regulation shall be applied whether or not it is the law of a Member State.

CHAPTER II

TORTS/DELICTS

Article 4

General rule

1. Unless otherwise provided for in this Regulation, the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of a tort/delict shall be the law of the country in which the damage occurs irrespective of the country in which the event giving rise to the damage occurred and irrespective of the country or countries in which the indirect consequences of that event occur.

2. However, where the person claimed to be liable and the person sustaining damage both have their habitual residence in the same country at the time when the damage occurs, the law of that country shall apply.

3. Where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the tort/delict is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in paragraphs 1 or 2, the law of that other country shall apply. A manifestly closer connection with another country might be based in particular on a pre-existing relationship between the parties, such as a contract, that is closely connected with the tort/delict in question.

Article 5

Product liability

1. Without prejudice to Article 4(2), the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of damage caused by a product shall be:

(a) the law of the country in which the person sustaining the damage had his or her habitual residence when the damage occurred, if the product was marketed in that country; or, failing that,

(b) the law of the country in which the product was acquired, if the product was marketed in that country; or, failing that,

(c) the law of the country in which the damage occurred, if the product was marketed in that country.

However, the law applicable shall be the law of the country in which the person claimed to be liable is habitually resident if he or she could not reasonably foresee the marketing of the product, or a product of the same type, in the country the law of which is applicable under (a), (b) or (c).

2. Where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the tort/delict is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in paragraph 1, the law of that other country shall apply. A manifestly closer connection with another country might be based in particular on a pre-existing relationship between the parties, such as a contract, that is closely connected with the tort/delict in question.

Article 6

Unfair competition and acts restricting free competition

1. The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of an act of unfair competition shall be the law of the country where competitive relations or the collective interests of consumers are, or are likely to be, affected.

2. Where an act of unfair competition affects exclusively the interests of a specific competitor, Article 4 shall apply.

3. (a) The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of a restriction of competition shall be the law of the country where the market is, or is likely to be, affected.

(b) When the market is, or is likely to be, affected in more than one country, the person seeking compensation for damage who sues in the court of the domicile of the defendant, may instead choose to base his or her claim on the law of the court seised, provided that the market in that Member

State is amongst those directly and substantially affected by the restriction of competition out of which the non-contractual obligation on which the claim is based arises; where the claimant sues, in accordance with the applicable rules on jurisdiction, more than one defendant in that court, he or she can only choose to base his or her claim on the law of that court if the restriction of competition on which the claim against each of these defendants relies directly and substantially affects also the market in the Member State of that court.

4. The law applicable under this Article may not be derogated from by an agreement pursuant to Article 14.

Article 7

Environmental damage

The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of environmental damage or damage sustained by persons or property as a result of such damage shall be the law determined pursuant to Article 4(1), unless the person seeking compensation for damage chooses to base his or her claim on the law of the country in which the event giving rise to the damage occurred.

Article 8

Infringement of intellectual property rights

1. The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising from an infringement of an intellectual property right shall be the law of the country for which protection is claimed.

2. In the case of a non-contractual obligation arising from an infringement of a unitary Community intellectual property right, the law applicable shall, for any question that is not governed by the relevant Community instrument, be the law of the country in which the act of infringement was committed.

3. The law applicable under this Article may not be derogated from by an agreement pursuant to Article 14.

Article 9

Industrial action

Without prejudice to Article 4(2), the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation in respect of the liability of a person in the capacity of a worker or an employer or the organisations representing their professional interests for damages caused by an industrial action, pending or carried out, shall be the law of the country where the action is to be, or has been, taken.

CHAPTER III

UNJUST ENRICHMENT, NEGOTIORUM GESTIO AND CULPA IN CONTRAHENDO

Article 10

Unjust enrichment

1. If a non-contractual obligation arising out of unjust enrichment, including payment of amounts wrongly received, concerns a relationship existing between the parties, such as one arising out of a contract or a tort/delict, that is closely connected with that unjust enrichment, it shall be governed by the law that governs that relationship.

2. Where the law applicable cannot be determined on the basis of paragraph 1 and the parties have their habitual residence in the same country when the event giving rise to unjust enrichment occurs, the law of that country shall apply.

3. Where the law applicable cannot be determined on the basis of paragraphs 1 or 2, it shall be the law of the country in which the unjust enrichment took place.

4. Where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the non-contractual obligation arising out of unjust enrichment is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3, the law of that other country shall apply.

Article 11

Negotiorum gestio

1. If a non-contractual obligation arising out of an act performed without due authority in connection with the affairs of another person concerns a relationship existing between the parties, such as one arising out of a contract or a tort/delict, that is closely connected with that non-contractual obligation, it shall be governed by the law that governs that relationship.

2. Where the law applicable cannot be determined on the basis of paragraph 1, and the parties have their habitual residence in the same country when the event giving rise to the damage occurs, the law of that country shall apply.

3. Where the law applicable cannot be determined on the basis of paragraphs 1 or 2, it shall be the law of the country in which the act was performed.

4. Where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the non-contractual obligation arising out of an act performed without due authority in connection with the affairs of another person is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3, the law of that other country shall apply.

Article 12

Culpa in contrahendo

1. The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of dealings prior to the conclusion of a contract, regardless of whether the contract was actually concluded or not, shall be the law that applies to the contract or that would have been applicable to it had it been entered into.

2. Where the law applicable cannot be determined on the basis of paragraph 1, it shall be:

(a) the law of the country in which the damage occurs, irrespective of the country in which the event giving rise to the damage occurred and irrespective of the country or countries in which the indirect consequences of that event occurred; or

(b) where the parties have their habitual residence in the same country at the time when the event giving rise to the damage occurs, the law of that country; or

(c) where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the non-contractual obligation arising out of dealings prior to the conclusion of a contract is manifestly more closely connected with a country other than that indicated in points (a) and (b), the law of that other country.

Article 13

Applicability of Article 8

For the purposes of this Chapter, Article 8 shall apply to non-contractual obligations arising from an infringement of an intellectual property right.

CHAPTER IV

FREEDOM OF CHOICE

Article 14

Freedom of choice

1. The parties may agree to submit non-contractual obligations to the law of their choice:

(a) by an agreement entered into after the event giving rise to the damage occurred;

or

(b) where all the parties are pursuing a commercial activity, also by an agreement freely negotiated before the event giving rise to the damage occurred.

The choice shall be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the circumstances of the case and shall not prejudice the rights of third parties.

2. Where all the elements relevant to the situation at the time when the event giving rise to the damage occurs are located in a country other than the country whose law has been chosen, the choice of the parties shall not prejudice the application of provisions of the law of that other country which cannot be derogated from by agreement.

3. Where all the elements relevant to the situation at the time when the event giving rise to the damage occurs are located in one or more of the Member States, the parties' choice of the law applicable other than that of a Member State shall not prejudice the application of provisions of Community law, where appropriate as implemented in the Member State of the forum, which cannot be derogated from by agreement.

CHAPTER V

COMMON RULES

Article 15

Scope of the law applicable

The law applicable to non-contractual obligations under this Regulation shall govern in particular:

(a) the basis and extent of liability, including the determination of persons who may be held liable for acts performed by them;

(b) the grounds for exemption from liability, any limitation of liability and any division of liability;

(c) the existence, the nature and the assessment of damage or the remedy claimed;

(d) within the limits of powers conferred on the court by its procedural law, the measures which a court may take to prevent or terminate injury or damage or to ensure the provision of compensation;

(e) the question whether a right to claim damages or a remedy may be transferred, including by inheritance;

(f) persons entitled to compensation for damage sustained personally;

(g) liability for the acts of another person;

(h) the manner in which an obligation may be extinguished and rules of prescription and limitation, including rules relating to the commencement, interruption and suspension of a period of prescription or limitation.

Article 16

Overriding mandatory provisions

Nothing in this Regulation shall restrict the application of the provisions of the law of the forum in a situation where they are mandatory irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the non-contractual obligation.

Article 17

Rules of safety and conduct

In assessing the conduct of the person claimed to be liable, account shall be taken, as a matter of fact and in so far as is appropriate, of the rules of safety and conduct which were in force at the place and time of the event giving rise to the liability.

Article 18

Direct action against the insurer of the person liable

The person having suffered damage may bring his or her claim directly against the insurer of the person liable to provide compensation if the law applicable to the non-contractual obligation or the law applicable to the insurance contract so provides.

Article 19

Subrogation

Where a person (the creditor) has a non-contractual claim upon another (the debtor), and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, or has in fact satisfied the creditor in discharge of that duty, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether, and the extent to which, the third person is entitled to exercise against the debtor the rights which the creditor had against the debtor under the law governing their relationship.

Article 20

Multiple liability

If a creditor has a claim against several debtors who are liable for the same claim, and one of the debtors has already satisfied the claim in whole or in part, the question of that debtor's right to demand compensation from the other debtors shall be governed by the law applicable to that debtor's non-contractual obligation towards the creditor.

Article 21

Formal validity

A unilateral act intended to have legal effect and relating to a non-contractual obligation shall be formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law governing the non-contractual obligation in question or the law of the country in which the act is performed.

Article 22

1. The law governing a non-contractual obligation under this Regulation shall apply to the extent that, in matters of non-contractual obligations, it contains rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. Acts intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognised by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 21 under which that act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

CHAPTER VI

OTHER PROVISIONS

Article 23

Habitual residence

1. For the purposes of this Regulation, the habitual residence of companies and other bodies, corporate or unincorporated, shall be the place of central administration.

Where the event giving rise to the damage occurs, or the damage arises, in the course of operation of a branch, agency or any other establishment, the place where the branch, agency or any other establishment is located shall be treated as the place of habitual residence.

2. For the purposes of this Regulation, the habitual residence of a natural person acting in the course of his or her business activity shall be his or her principal place of business.

Article 24

Exclusion of renvoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Regulation means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law.

Article 25

States with more than one legal system

1. Where a State comprises several territorial units, each of which has its own rules of law in respect of non-contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Regulation.

2. A Member State within which different territorial units have their own rules of law in respect of non-contractual obligations shall not be required to apply this Regulation to conflicts solely between the laws of such units.

Article 26

Public policy of the forum

The application of a provision of the law of any country specified by this Regulation may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy (ordre public) of the forum.

Article 27

Relationship with other provisions of Community law

This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of provisions of Community law which, in relation to particular matters, lay down conflict-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations.

Article 28

Relationship with existing international conventions

1. This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of international conventions to which one or more Member States are parties at the time when this Regulation is adopted and which lay down conflict-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations.

2. However, this Regulation shall, as between Member States, take precedence over conventions concluded exclusively between two or more of them in so far as such conventions concern matters governed by this Regulation.

CHAPTER VII

FINAL PROVISIONS

Article 29

List of conventions

1. By 11 July 2008, Member States shall notify the Commission of the conventions referred to in Article 28(1). After that date, Member States shall notify the Commission of all denunciations of such conventions.

2. The Commission shall publish in the Official Journal of the European Union within six months of receipt:

(i) a list of the conventions referred to in paragraph 1;

(ii) the denunciations referred to in paragraph 1.

Article 30

Review clause

1. Not later than 20 August 2011, the Commission shall submit to the European Parliament, the Council and the European Economic and Social Committee a report on the application of this Regulation. If necessary, the report shall be accompanied by proposals to adapt this Regulation. The report shall include:

(i) a study on the effects of the way in which foreign law is treated in the different jurisdictions and on the extent to which courts in the Member States apply foreign law in practice pursuant to this Regulation;

(ii) a study on the effects of Article 28 of this Regulation with respect to the Hague Convention of 4 May 1971 on the law applicable to traffic accidents.

2. Not later than 31 December 2008, the Commission shall submit to the European Parliament, the Council and the European Economic and Social Committee a study on the situation in the field of the law applicable to non-contractual obligations arising out of violations of privacy and rights relating to personality, taking into account rules relating to freedom of the press and freedom of expression in the media, and conflict-of-law issues related to Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data [7].

Article 31

Commission Statement on the review clause (Article 30)

The Commission, following the invitation by the European Parliament and the Council in the frame of Article 30 of the "Rome II" Regulation, will submit, not later than December 2008, a study on the situation in the field of the law applicable to non-contractual obligations arising out of violations of privacy and rights relating to personality. The Commission will take into consideration all aspects of the situation and take appropriate measures if necessary.

Commission Statement on road accidents

The Commission, being aware of the different practices followed in the Member States as regards the level of compensation awarded to victims of road traffic accidents, is prepared to examine the specific problems resulting for EU residents involved in road traffic accidents in a Member State other than the Member State of their habitual residence. To that end the Commission will make available to the European Parliament and to the Council, before the end of 2008, a study on all options, including insurance aspects, for improving the position of cross-border victims, which would pave the way for a Green Paper.

Commission Statement on the treatment of foreign law

The Commission, being aware of the different practices followed in the Member States as regards the treatment of foreign law, will publish at the latest four years after the entry into force of the "Rome II" Regulation and in any event as soon as it is available a horizontal study on the application of foreign law in civil and commercial matters by the courts of the Member States, having regard to the aims of the Hague Programme. It is also prepared to take appropriate measures if necessary.

Proposal for a REGULATION OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL ON THE LAW APPLICABLE TO NON-CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATIONS ("ROME II")

(presented by the Commission)

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM

1. INTRODUCTION

1.1. Context

By Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union, the Member States set themselves the objective of maintaining and developing the Union as an area of freedom, security and justice, in which the free movement of persons is assured and litigants can assert their rights in the courts and before the authorities of all the Member States, enjoying facilities equivalent to those they enjoy in their own country.

To establish a genuine European law-enforcement area, the Community, under Articles 61(c) and 65 of the Treaty establishing the European Community, is to adopt measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters in so far as necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market. The Tampere European Council on 15 and 16 October 1999 [1] acknowledged the mutual recognition principle as the cornerstone of judicial cooperation in the Union. It asked the Council and the Commission to adopt, by December 2000, a programme of measures to implement the mutual recognition principle.

[1] Presidency conclusions of 16 October 1999, points 28 to 39.

The joint Commission and Council programme of measures to implement the principle of mutual recognition of decisions in civil and commercial matters, adopted by the Council on 30 November 2000, [2] states that measures relating to harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules, which may sometimes be incorporated in the same instruments as those relating to jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments, actually do help facilitate the mutual recognition of judgments. The fact that the courts of the Member States apply the same conflict rules to determine the law applicable to a practical situation reinforces the mutual trust in judicial decisions given in other Member States and is a vital element in attaining the longer-term objective of the free movement of judgments without intermediate review measures.

1.2. Complementarity with instruments of private international law already in force in the Community

This initiative relates to the Community harmonisation of private international law in civil and commercial matters that began late in the 1960s. On 27 September 1968 the six Member States of the European Economic Community concluded a Convention on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (the "Brussels Convention") on the basis of the fourth indent of Article 293 (formerly 220) of the EC Treaty. This was drawn up on the idea, already described in the EC Treaty, that the establishment of a common market implied the possibility of having a judgment given in any Member State recognised and enforced as easily as possible. To facilitate the attainment of that objective, the Brussels Convention begins by setting out rules identifying the Member State whose courts have jurisdiction to hear and determine a cross-border dispute.

The mere fact that there are rules governing the jurisdiction of the courts does not generate reasonable foreseeability as to the outcome of a case being heard on the merits. The Brussels Convention and the "Brussels I" Regulation that superseded it on 1 March 2001 [3] contain a number of options enabling claimants to prefer this or that court. The risk is that parties will opt for the courts of one Member State rather than another simply because the law applicable in the courts of this state would be more favourable to them.

[3] Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000, OJ L 12, 16.1.2001, p. 1, replacing the Brussels Convention of 1968, of which a consolidated version was published in OJ C 27, 26.1.1998, p. 1. But the Brussels Convention remains in force for relations between Denmark and the other Member States.

That is why work began on codifying the rules on conflicts of laws in the Community in 1967. The Commission convened two meetings of experts in 1969, at which it was agreed to focus initially on questions having the greatest impact on the operation of the common market the law applicable to tangible and intangible property, contractual and non-contractual obligations and the form of legal documents. On 23 June 1972, the experts presented a first preliminary draft convention on the law applicable to contractual and non-contractual obligations. Following the accession of the United Kingdom, Ireland and Denmark, the group was expanded in 1973, and that slowed progress. In March 1978, the decision was taken to confine attention to contractual obligations so that negotiations could be completed within a reasonable time and to commence negotiations later for a second convention on non-contractual obligations.

In June 1980 the Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations (the "Rome Convention") was opened for signature, and it entered into force on 1 April 1991. [4] As there was no proper legal basis in the EC Treaty at the time of its signing, the convention takes the traditional form of an international treaty. But as it was seen as the indispensable adjunct to the Brussels Convention, the complementarity being referred to expressly in the Preamble, it is treated in the same way as the instruments adopted on the basis of Article 293 (ex-220) and is an integral part of the Community acquis.

[4] The consolidated text of the Convention as amended by the various Conventions of Accession, and the declarations and protocols annexed to it, is published in OJ C 27, 26.1.1998, p. 34.

Given the substantial difference in scope between the Brussels and Rome Conventions the former covers both contractual and non-contractual obligations whereas the latter covers only contractual obligations the proposed Regulation, commonly known as "Rome II", will be the natural extension of the unification of the rules of private international law relating to contractual and non-contractual obligations in civil or commercial matters in the Community.

1.3. Resumption of work in the 1990s under the Maastricht and Amsterdam Treaties

Article K.1(6) of the Union Treaty in the Maastricht version classified judicial cooperation in civil matters in the areas of common interest to the Member States of the European Union. In its Resolution of 14 October 1996 laying down the priorities for cooperation in the field of justice and home affairs for the period from 1 July 1996 to 30 June 1998, [5] the Council stated that, in pursuing the objectives set by the European Council, it intended to concentrate during the above period on certain priority areas, which included the "launching of discussions on the necessity and possibility of drawing up... a convention on the law applicable to extra-contractual obligations".

In February 1998 the Commission sent the Member States a questionnaire on a draft convention on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations. The Austrian Presidency held four working meetings to examine the replies to the questionnaire. It was established that all the Member States supported the principle of an instrument on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations. At the same time the Commission financed a Grotius project [6] presented by the European Private International Law Group (Gedip) to examine the feasibility of a European Convention on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations, which culminated in a draft text. [7] The Council' s ad hoc "Rome II" Working Party continued to meet throughout 1999 under the German and Finnish Presidencies, examining the draft texts presented by the Austrian Presidency and by Gedip. An initial consensus emerged on a number of conflict rules, which this proposal for a Regulation duly reflects.

The Amsterdam Treaty, which entered into force on 1 May 1999, having moved cooperation in civil matters into the Community context, the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 3 December 1998 adopted the Action Plan of the Council and the Commission on how best to implement the provisions of the Treaty of Amsterdam on an area of freedom, security and justice. [8] It recalls that principles such as certainty in the law and equal access to justice require among other things "clear designation of the applicable law" and states in paragraph 40 that "The following measures should be taken within two years after the entry into force of the Treaty:... b) drawing up a legal instrument on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations (Rome II)".

On 3 May 2002, the Commission launched consultations with interested circles on an initial preliminary draft proposal for a "Rome II" Regulation prepared by the Directorate-General for Justice and Home Affairs. The consultations prompted a very wide response, and the Commission received 80 or so written contributions from the Member States, academics, representatives of industry and consumers' associations. [9] The written consultation procedure was followed by a public hearing in Brussels on 7 January 2003. This proposal duly reflects the comments received.

2. PROPOSAL FOR A EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND COUNCIL REGULATION

2.1. General purpose - to improve the foreseeability of solutions regarding the applicable law

The purpose of this proposal for a regulation is to standardise the Member States' rules of conflict of laws regarding non-contractual obligations and thus extend the harmonisation of private international law in relation to civil and commercial obligations which is already well advanced in the Community with the "Brussels I" Regulation and the Rome Convention of 1980.

The harmonisation of conflict rules, which must be distinguished from the harmonisation of substantive law, seeks to harmonise the rules whereby the law applicable to an obligation is determined. This technique is particularly suitable for settling cross-border disputes, as, by stating with reasonable certainty the law applicable to the obligation in question irrespective of the forum, it can help to develop a European area of justice. Instead of having to study often widely differing conflict rules of all the Member States' courts that might have jurisdiction in a case, this proposal allows the parties to confine themselves to studying a single set of conflict rules, thus reducing the cost of litigation and boosting the foreseeability of solutions and certainty as to the law.

These general observations are particularly apt in the case of non-contractual obligations, the importance of which for the internal market is clear from sectoral instruments, in force or in preparation, governing this or that specific aspect (product liability or environmental liability, for example).

The approximation of the substantive law of obligations is no more than embryonic. Despite common principles, there are still major divergences between Member States, in particular as regards the following questions: the boundary between strict liability and fault-based liability; compensation for indirect damage and third-party damage; compensation for non-material damage, including third-party damage; compensation in excess of actual damage sustained (punitive and exemplary damages); the liability of minors; and limitation periods. During the consultations undertaken by the Commission, several representatives of industry stated that these divergences made it difficult to exercise fundamental freedoms in the internal market. They realised that harmonisation of the substantive law was not a short-term prospect and stressed the importance of the rules of conflict of laws to improve the foreseeability of solutions.

A comparative law analysis of the rules of conflict of laws reveals that the present situation does not meet economic operators' need for foreseeability and that the differences are markedly wider than was the case for contracts before the harmonisation achieved by the Rome Convention. Admittedly, the Member States virtually all give pride of place to the lex loci delicti commissi, whereby torts/delicts are governed by the law of the place where the act was committed. The application of this rule is problematic, however, in the case of what are known as "complex" torts/delicts, where the harmful event and the place where the loss is sustained are spread over several countries. [10] There are variations between national laws as regards the practical impact of the lex loci delicti commissi rule in the case of cross-border non-contractual obligations. While certain Member States still take the traditional solution of applying the law of the country where the event giving rise to the damage occurred, recent developments more commonly tend to support the law of the country where the damage is sustained. But to understand the law in force in a Member State, it is not enough to ascertain whether the harmful event or the damage sustained is the dominant factor. The basic rule needs to be combined with other criteria. A growing number of Member States allow a claimant to opt for the law that is most favourable to him. Others leave it to the courts to determine the country with which the situation is most closely connected, either as a basic rule or exceptionally where the basic rule turns out to be inappropriate in the individual case. Generally speaking most Member States use a sometimes complex combination of the different solutions. Apart from the diversity of solutions, their legibility is not improved by the fact that only some of the Member States have codified their conflict-of-laws rules; in the others, solutions emerge gradually from the decisions of the courts and often remain uncertain, particularly as regards special torts/delicts.

[10] See the decision of the Court of Justice in the following notes as regards the account to be taken of this spreading of factors for the international jurisdiction of the courts.

There is no doubt that replacing more than fifteen national systems of conflict rules [11] by a single set of uniform rules would represent considerable progress for economic operators and the general public in terms of certainty as to the law.

[11] There are more than fifteen national systems because the United Kingdom does not have a unitary system.

The next need is to analyse the conflict rules in the context of the rules governing the international jurisdiction of the courts. Apart from the basic jurisdiction of the courts for the place of the defendant' s habitual residence, provided for by Article 2 of the "Brussels I" Regulation, Article 5(3) provides for a special head of jurisdiction in relation to torts/delicts and quasi-delict in the form of "the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred...". The Court of Justice has always held that where the place where the harmful act occurred and the place where the loss is sustained are not the same, the defendant can be sued, at the claimant's choice, in the courts either of the place where the harmful act occurred or of the place where the loss is sustained. [12] Admittedly, the Court acknowledged that each of the two places could constitute a meaningful connecting factor for jurisdiction purposes, since each could be of significance in terms of evidence and organisation of the proceedings, but it is also true that the number of forums available to the claimant generates a risk of forum-shopping.

[12] Case 21/76 Mines de Potasse d' Alsace [1976] ECR 1735 (judgment given on 30.11.1976).

This proposal for a Regulation would allow parties to determine the rule applicable to a given legal relationship in advance, and with reasonable certainty, especially as the proposed uniform rules will receive a uniform interpretation from the Court of Justice. This initiative would accordingly help to boost certainty in the law and promote the proper functioning of the internal market. It is also in the Commission's programme of measures to facilitate the extra-judicial settlement of disputes, since the fact that the parties have a clear vision of their situation makes it all the easier to come to an amicable agreement.

2.2. Legal basis

Since the Amsterdam Treaty came into force, conflict rules have been governed by Article 61(c) of the EC Treaty. Under Article 67 of the EC Treaty, as amended by the Nice Treaty that entered into force on 1 February 2003, the Regulation will be adopted by the codecision procedure laid down by Article 251 of the EC Treaty.

Article 65(b) provides: "Measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters having cross-border implications, to be taken ... in so far as necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market, shall include: promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws ..."

The Community legislature has the power to put flesh on the bones of this Article and the discretion to determine whether a measure is necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market. The Council exercised this power when adopting the Vienna action plan of 3 December 1998 [13] on how best to implement the provisions of the Treaty of Amsterdam on an area of freedom, security and justice, point 40(c) of which calls expressly for a "Rome II" instrument.

Harmonisation of the conflict rules helps to promote equal treatment between economic operators and individuals involved in cross-border litigation in the internal market. It is the necessary adjunct to the harmonisation already achieved by the "Brussels I" Regulation as regards the rules governing the international jurisdiction of the courts and the mutual recognition of judgments. Given that there are more than fifteen different systems of conflict rules, two firms in distinct Member States, A and B, bringing the same dispute between them and a third firm in country C before their respective courts would have different conflict rules applied to them, which could provoke a distortion of competition. Such a distortion could also incite operators to go forum-shopping.

But the harmonisation of the conflict rules also facilitates the implementation of the principle of the mutual recognition of judgments in civil and commercial matters. The mutual recognition programme [14] calls for the reduction and ultimately the abolition of intermediate measures for recognition of a judgment given in another Member State. But the removal of all intermediate measures calls for a degree of mutual trust between Member States which is not conceivable if their courts do not all apply the same conflict rule in the same situation.

[14] OJ C 12, 15.1.2001, p. 8.

Title IV of the EC Treaty, which covers the matters to which this proposal for a Regulation applies, does not apply to Denmark by virtue of the Protocol concerning it. Nor does it apply to the United Kingdom or Ireland, unless those countries exercise their option of joining the initiative (opt-in clause) on the conditions set out in the Protocol annexed to the Treaty. At the Council meeting (Justice and Home Affairs) on 12 March 1999, these two Member States announced their intention of being fully associated with Community activities in relation to judicial cooperation in civil matters. They were also fully associated with the work of the ad hoc Council working party before the Amsterdam Treaty entered into force.

2.3. Justification for proposal in terms of proportionality and subsidiarity principles

The technique of harmonising conflict-of-laws rules fully respects the subsidiarity and proportionality principles since it enhances certainty in the law without demanding harmonisation of the substantive rules of domestic law.

As for the choice of instrument, point 6 of the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality provides that "Other things being equal, directives should be preferred to regulations and framework directives to detailed measures." But for the purposes of this proposal a Regulation is the most appropriate instrument. It lays down uniform rules for the applicable law. These rules are detailed, precise and unconditional and require no measures by the Member States for their transposal into national law. They are therefore self-executing. The nature of these rules is the direct result of the objective set for them, which is to enhance certainty in the law and the foreseeability of the solutions adopted as regards the law applicable to a given legal relationship. If the Member States had room for manoeuvre in transposing these rules, uncertainty would be reintroduced into the law, and that is precisely what the harmonisation is supposed to abolish. The Regulation is therefore the instrument that must be chosen to guarantee uniform application in the Member States.

3. INDIVIDUAL PROVISIONS

Article 1 - Material scope

Like the Brussels Convention and the "Brussels I" Regulation, the proposed Regulation covers civil and commercial obligations. This is an autonomous concept of Community law that has been interpreted by the Court of Justice. The reference to this makes it clear that the "Brussels I" Regulation, the Rome Convention and the Regulation proposed here constitute a coherent set of instruments covering the general field of private international law in matters of civil and commercial obligations.

The scope of the Regulation covers all non-contractual obligations except those in matters listed in paragraph 2. Non-contractual obligations are in two major categories, those that arise out of a tort or delict and those that do not. The first category comprises obligations relating to tort or delict, and the second comprises obligations relating to what in some jurisdictions is termed "quasi-delict" or "quasi-contract", including in particular unjust enrichment and agency without authority or negotiorum gestio. The latter category is governed by section 2. But the demarcation line between contractual obligations and obligations based on tort or delict is not identical in all the Member States, and there may be doubts as to which instrument the Rome Convention or the proposed Regulation should be applied in a given dispute, for example in the event of pre-contractual liability, of culpa in contrahendo or of actions by creditors to have certain transactions by their debtors declared void as prejudicial to their interests. The Court of Justice, in actions under Articles 5(1) and (3) of the Brussels Convention, has already had occasion to rule that tort/delict cases are residual in relation to contract cases, which must be defined in strict terms. [15] It will no doubt refine its analysis when interpreting the proposed Regulation.

[15] Case 34/82 Martin Peters [1983] ECR I-987 (judgment given on 22 March 1983); Case C-26/91 Jacob Handte [1992] ECR I-3697 (judgment given on 17 June 1992); Case C-334/00 Fonderie Officine Meccaniche Tacconi [202] ECR I-7357 (judgment given on 17.9.2002).

The proposed Regulation would apply to all situations involving a conflict of laws, i.e. situations in which there are one or more elements that are alien to the domestic social life of a country that entail applying several systems of law. Under Article 1(2), the following are excluded from the scope of the proposed Regulation:

a) non-contractual obligations arising out of family or similar relationships: family obligations do not in general arise from a tort or delict. But such obligations can occasionally appear in the family context, as is the case of an action for compensation for damage caused by late payment of a maintenance obligation. Some commentators have suggested including these obligations within the scope of the Regulation on the grounds that they are governed by the exception clause in Article 3(3), which expressly refers to the mechanism of the "secondary connection" that places them under the same law as the underlying family relationship. Since there are so far no harmonised conflict-of-laws rules in the Community as regards family law, it has been found preferable to exclude non-contractual obligations arising out of such relationships from the scope of the proposed Regulation.

b) Non-contractual obligations arising in connection with matrimonial property regimes and successions: these are excluded for similar reasons to those given at point a).

c) Non-contractual obligations arising out of bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments to the extent that the obligations under such other negotiable instruments arise out of their negotiable character; this point is taken over from Article 1(2)(c) of the Rome Convention. It is incorporated here for the same reasons as are given in the Giuliano-Lagarde Report, [16] namely that the Regulation is not the proper instrument for such obligations, that the Geneva Conventions of 7 June 1930 and 19 March 1931 regulate much of this matter and that these obligations are not dealt with uniformly in the Member States.

[16] Report on the Convention on the law applicable to contractual obligations, OJ C 282, 31.10.1980, p. 1.

d) The personal legal liability of officers and members as such for the debts of a company or firm or other body corporate or unincorporate, and the personal legal liability of persons responsible for carrying out the statutory audits of accounting documents: this question cannot be separated from the law governing companies or firms or other bodies corporate or unincorporate that is applicable to the company or firm or other body corporate or unincorporate in connection with whose management the question of liability arises.

e) Non-contractual obligations among the settlers, trustees and beneficiaries of a trust: trusts are a sui generis institution and should be excluded from the scope of this Regulation as previously from the Rome Convention.

f) non-contractual obligations arising out of nuclear damage: this exclusion is explained by the importance of the economic and State interests at stake and the Member States' contribution to measures to compensate for nuclear damage in the international scheme of nuclear liability established by the Paris Convention of 29 July 1960 and the Additional Convention of Brussels of 31 January 1963, the Vienna Convention of 21 May 1963, the Convention on Supplementary Compensation of 12 September 1997 and the Protocol of 21 September 1988.

These being exceptions, the exclusions will have to be interpreted strictly.

The proposed Regulation does not take over the exclusion in Article 1(2)(h) of the Rome Convention, which concerns rules of evidence and procedure. It is clear from Article 11 that, subject to the exceptions mentioned, these rules are matters for the lex fori. They would be out of place in a list of non-contractual obligations excluded from the scope of this Regulation.

Article 2 - Universal application

Under Article 2, this is a universal Regulation, meaning that the uniform conflict rules can designate the law of a Member State of the European Union or of a third country.

This is a firmly-rooted principle of the law concerning conflict of laws and already exists in the Rome Convention, the conventions concluded in the Hague Conference and the domestic law of the Member States.

Given the complementarily between "Brussels I" and the proposed Regulation, the universal nature of the latter is necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market as avoiding distortions of competition between Community litigants. If the "Brussels I" Regulation distinguishes a priori between situations in which the defendant is habitually resident in the territory of a Member State and those in which he is habitually resident in a third country, [17] it still governs both purely "intra-Community" situations and situations involving a "foreign" element. For the rules of recognition and enforcement, first of all, all judgments given by a court in a Member State that are within the scope of the "Brussels I" Regulation qualify for the simplified recognition and enforcement scheme; the law under which the judgment was given the law of a Member State or of a third country therefore has very little impact. As for the rules of jurisdiction, the "Brussels I" Regulation also applies where the defendant is habitually resident outside Community territory: this is the case where the dispute is within an exclusive jurisdiction rule, [18] where the jurisdiction of the court proceeds from a jurisdiction clause, [19] where the defendant enters an appearance [20] and where the lis pendens rule applies; [21] in general, Article 4(2) specifies that where the defendant is habitually resident in a third country, the claimant, if habitually resident in a Member States, may rely on exorbitant rules of the law of the country where he is habitually resident, irrespective of his nationality. It follows from all these provisions that the "Brussels I" Regulation applies both to "intra-Community" situations and to situations involving an "extra-Community" element.

[19] Article 23.

[20] Article 24.

[21] Article 27.

What must be sought, therefore, is equal treatment for Community litigants, even in situations that are not purely "intra-Community". If there continue to be more than fifteen different systems of conflict rules, two firms in distinct Member States, A and B, bringing the same dispute between them and a third firm in country C before their respective courts, would have different conflict rules applied to them, which could provoke a distortion of competition as in purely intra-Community situations.

Moreover, the separation between "intra-Community" and "extra-Community" disputes is by now artificial. How, for instance, are we to describe a dispute that initially concerns only a national of a Member State and a national of a third country but subsequently develops into a dispute concerning several Member States, for instance where the Community party joins an insurer established in another Member State or the debt in issue is assigned. Given the extent to which economic relations in the internal market are now intertwined, all disputes potentially have an intra-Community nature.

And on purely practical grounds, evidence presented to the Commission by the legal professions - both bench and bar - in the course of the written consultation emphasised that private international law in general and the conflict rules in particular are perceived as highly complex. This complexity would be even greater if this measure had the effect of doubling the sources of conflict rules and if practitioners now had to deal not only with Community uniform rules but also with distinct national rules in situations not connected as required with Community territory. The universal nature of the proposed Regulation accordingly meets the concern for certainty in the law and the Union' s commitment in favour of transparent legislation.

Article 3 - General rules

Article 3 lays down general rules for determining the law applicable to non-contractual obligations arising out of a tort or delict. It covers all obligations for which the following Articles lay down no special rule.

The Commission' s objectives in confirming the lex loci delicti commissi rule are to guarantee certainty in the law and to seek to strike a reasonable balance between the person claimed to be liable and the person sustaining the damage. The solutions adopted here also reflect recent developments in the Member States' conflict rules.

Paragraph 1 - General rule

Article 3(1) takes as the basic rule the law of the place where the direct damage arises or is likely to arise. In most cases this corresponds to the law of the injured party's country of residence. The expression "is likely to arise" shows that the proposed Regulation, like Article 5(3) of the "Brussels I" Regulation, also covers preventive actions such as actions for a prohibitive injunction.

The place or places where indirect damage, if any, was sustained are not relevant for determining the applicable law. In the event of a traffic accident, for example, the place of the direct damage is the place where the collision occurs, irrespective of financial or non-material damage sustained in another country. In a Brussels Convention case the Court of Justice held that the "place where the harmful event occurred" does not include the place where the victim suffered financial damage following upon initial damage arising and suffered by him in another Contracting State. [22]

[22] Case C-364/93 Marinari v Lloyds Bank [1995] ECR I -2719 (judgment given on 19.9.1995).

The rule entails, where damage is sustained in several countries, that the laws of all the countries concerned will have to be applied on a distributive basis, applying what is known as "Mosaikbetrachtung" in German law.

The proposed Regulation also reflects recent developments in the Member States' conflict rules. While the absence of codification in several Member States makes it impossible to give a clear answer for the more than fifteen systems, the connection to the law of the place where the damage was sustained has been adopted by those Member States where the rules have recently been codified. The solution applies to the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and France, but also in Switzerland. In Germany, Italy and Poland, the victim may opt for this law among others.

The solution in Article 3(1) meets the concern for certainty in the law. It diverges from the solution in the draft Convention of 1972, which takes as its basic rule the place where the "harmful event" occurred. But the Court of Justice has held that the "harmful event" covers both the act itself and the resultant damage. This solution reflects the specific objectives of international jurisdiction but it does not enable the parties to foresee the law that will be applicable to their situation with reasonable certainty.

The rule also reflects the need to strike a reasonable balance between the various interests at stake. The Commission has not adopted the principle of favouring the victim as a basic rule, which would give the victim the option of choosing the law most favourable to him. It considers that this solution would go beyond the victim' s legitimate expectations and would reintroduce uncertainty in the law, contrary to the general objective of the proposed Regulation. The solution in Article 3 is therefore a compromise between the two extreme solutions of applying the law of the place where the event giving rise to the damage occurs and giving the victim the option.

Article 3(1), which establishes an objective link between the damage and the applicable law, further reflects the modern concept of the law of civil liability which is no longer, as it was in the first half of the last century, oriented towards punishing for fault-based conduct: nowadays, it is the compensation function that dominates, as can be seen from the proliferation of no-fault strict liability schemes.

But the application of the basic rule might well be inappropriate where the situation has only a tenuous connection with the country where the damage occurs. The following paragraphs therefore exclude it in specified circumstances.

Paragraph 2 - Law of the common place of residence

Paragraph 2 introduces a special rule where the person claimed to be liable and the person who has allegedly sustained damage are habitually resident in the same country, the law of that country being applicable. This is the solution adopted by virtually all the Member States, either by means of a special rule or by the rule concerning connecting factors applied in the courts. It reflects the legitimate expectations of the two parties.

Paragraph 3 - General exception and secondary connection

Like Article 4(5) of the Rome Convention, paragraph 3 is a general exception clause which aims to bring a degree of flexibility, enabling the court to adapt the rigid rule to an individual case so as to apply the law that reflects the centre of gravity of the situation.

Since this clause generates a degree of unforeseeability as to the law that will be applicable, it must remain exceptional. Experience with the Rome Convention, which begins by setting out presumptions, has shown that the courts in some Member States tend to begin in fact with the exception clause and seek the law that best meets the proximity criterion, rather than starting from these presumptions. [23] That is why the rules in Article 3(1) and (2) of the proposed Regulation are drafted in the form of rules and not of mere presumptions. To make clear that the exception clause really must be exceptional, paragraph 3 requires the obligation to be "manifestly more closely connected" with another country.

[23] Cf. point 3.2.5 of the Green Paper on converting the Convention of Rome of 1980 on the law applicable to contractual obligations into a Community instrument and its modernisation.

Paragraph 3 then allows the court to be guided, for example, by the fact that the parties are already bound by a pre-existing relationship. This is a factor that can be taken into account to determine whether there is a manifestly closer connection with a country other than the one designated by the strict rules. But the law applicable to the pre-existing relationship does not apply automatically, and the court enjoys a degree of discretion to decide whether there is a significant connection between the non-contractual obligations and the law applicable to the pre-existing relationship.

The text states that the pre-existing relationship may consist of a contract that is closely connected with the non-contractual obligations in question. This solution is particularly interesting for Member States whose legal system allows both contractual and non-contractual obligations between the same parties. But the text is flexible enough to allow the court to take account of a contractual relationship that is still only contemplated, as in the case of the breakdown of negotiations or of annulment of a contract, or of a family relationship. By having the same law apply to all their relationships, this solution respects the parties' legitimate expectations and meets the need for sound administration of justice. On a more technical level, it means that the consequences of the fact that one and the same relationship may be covered by the law of contract in one Member State and the law of tort/delict in another can be mitigated, until such time as the Court of Justice comes up with its own autonomous response to the situation. The same reasoning applies to the consequences of the nullity of a contract, already covered by a special rule in Article 10(1)(e) of the Rome Convention. Certain Member States having expressed a reservation as to this Article, the use of the secondary connection mechanism will overcome the difficulties that might flow from the application of two separate instruments.

But where the pre-existing relationship consists of a consumer or employment contract and the contract contains a choice-of-law clause in favour of a law other than the law of the consumer' s habitual place of residence, the place where the employment contract is habitually performed or, exceptionally, the place where the employee was hired, the secondary connection mechanism cannot have the effect of depriving the weaker party of the protection of the law otherwise applicable. The proposed Regulation does not contain an express rule to this effect since the Commission considers that the solution is already implicit in the protective rules of the Rome Convention: Articles 5 and 6 would be deflected from their objective if the secondary connection validated the choice of the parties as regards non-contractual obligations but their choice was at least partly invalid as regards their contract.

Article 4 - Product liability

Article 4 introduces a specific rule for non-contractual obligations in the event of damage caused by a defective product. For the definition of product and defective product for the purposes of Article 4, Articles 2 and 6 of Directive 85/374 will apply. [24]

[24] Council Directive 85/374/EEC of 25.7.1985 on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States concerning liability for defective products (OJ L 210, 7.8.1985, p. 29), as amended by Directive 1999/34/EC of 10 May 1999 (OJ L 141, 4.6.1999, p. 20).

Directive 85/374 approximated the Member States' substantive law regarding strict liability, i.e. no-fault liability. But there is no full harmonisation, as the Member States are authorised to exercise certain options. The Directive does not affect national law concerning fault-based liability, which the victim can always rely on, and covers only certain types of damage. The scope of the special rule in Article 4 is consequently broader than the scope of Directive 85/374, as it also applies to actions based on purely national provisions governing product liability that do not emanate from the Directive.

Apart from respecting the parties' legitimate expectations, the conflict rule regarding product liability must reflect also the wide scatter of possible connecting factors (producer's headquarters, place of manufacture, place of first marketing, place of acquisition by the victim, victim' s habitual residence), accentuated by the development of international trade, tourism and the mobility of persons and goods in the Union. Connection solely to the place of the direct damage is not suitable here as the law thus designated could be unrelated to the real situation, unforeseeable for the producer and no source of adequate protection for the victim. [25]

[25] Such a case might be a German tourist buying French-made goods in Rome airport to take to an African country, where they explode and cause him to sustain damage.

Countries in which there are special rules thus tend to provide for a rule requiring several elements to be present in the same country for that country' s law to be applicable. This is also the approach taken in the Hague Convention 1973 on the law applicable to products liability, in force in five Member States. [26] Under Article 25 of the proposed Regulation, the Convention will remain in force in the Member States that have ratified it when the Regulation comes into force. The 1973 Convention determines the law applicable to the liability of manufacturers, producers, suppliers and repairers on the basis of the following factors, whether distributed or combined on a complex basis: the place of damage, place of the habitual residence of the victim, principal place of business of the manufacturer or producer, place where the product was acquired.

[26] Finland, France, Luxembourg the Netherlands and Spain. The convention is also in force in Norway, Croatia, Macedonia, Slovenia and Yugoslavia.

The proposed Regulation acknowledges the specific constraints inherent in the subject-matter in issue but nevertheless proceeds from the need for a rule to avoid being unnecessarily complex.

Under Article 4, the applicable law is basically the law of the place of where the person sustaining damage has his habitual residence. But this solution is conditional on the product having been marketed in that country with the consent of the person claimed to be liable. In the absence of consent, the applicable law is the law of the country in which the person claimed to be liable has his habitual residence. Article 3(2) (common habitual residence) and (3) (general exception clause) also apply.

The fact that this is a simple and predictable rule means that it is particularly suitable in an area where the number of out-of-court settlements is very high, partly because insurers are so often involved. Article 4 strikes a reasonable balance between the interests in issue. Given the requirement that the product be marketed in the country of the victim's habitual residence for his law to be applicable, the solution is foreseeable for the producer, who has control over his sales network. It also reflects the legitimate interests of the person sustaining damage, who will generally have acquired a product that is lawfully marketed in his country of residence.

Where the victim acquires the product in a country other than that of his habitual residence, perhaps while travelling, two hypotheses need to be distinguished: the first is where the victim acquired abroad a product also marketed in their country of residence, for instance in order to enjoy a special offer. In this case the producer had already foreseen that his activity might be evaluated by the yardstick of the rules in force in that country, and Article 4 designates the law of that country, since both parties could foresee that it would be applicable.

In the second hypothesis, by contrast, where the victim acquired abroad a product that is not lawfully marketed in their country of habitual residence, none of the parties would have expected that law to be applied. A subsidiary rule is consequently needed. The two connecting factors discussed during the Commission' s consultations were the place where the damage is sustained and the habitual residence of the person claimed to be liable. Since the large-scale mobility of consumer goods means that the connection to the place where the damage is sustained no longer meets the need for certainty in the law or for protection of the victim, the Commission has opted for the second solution.

The rule in Article 4 corresponds not only to the parties' expectations but also to the European Union's more general objectives of a high level of protection of consumers' health and the preservation of fair competition on a given market. By ensuring that all competitors on a given market are subject to the same safety standards, producers established in a low-protection country could no longer export their low standards to other countries, which will be a general incentive to innovation and scientific and technical development.

The expression "person claimed to be liable" does not necessarily mean the manufacturer of a finished product; it might also be the producer of a component or commodity, or even an intermediary or a retailer. Anybody who imports a product into the Community is considered in certain conditions to be responsible for the safety of the products in the same way as the producer. [27]

[27] Directive 85/374, Article 3(2).

Article 5 - Unfair competition

Article 5 provides for an autonomous connection for actions for damage arising out of an act of unfair competition.

The purpose of the rules against unfair competition is to protect fair competition by obliging all participants to play the game by the same rules. Among other things they outlaw acts calculated to influence demand (misleading advertising, forced sales, etc.), acts that impede competing supplies (disruption of deliveries by competitors, enticing away a competitor's staff, boycotts), and acts that exploit a competitor's value (passing off and the like). The modern competition law seeks to protect not only competitors (horizontal dimension) but also consumers and the public in general (vertical relations). This three-dimensional function of competition law must be reflected in a modern conflict-of-laws instrument.

Article 5 reflects this triple objective since it refers to the effect on the market in general, the effect on competitors' interests and the effect on the broad and rather vague interests of consumers (as opposed to the individual interests of a specific consumer). This last concept is taken over from a number of Community consumer-protection directives, in particular Directive 98/27 of 19 May 1998. [28] This is not to say that the concept relates solely to actions brought by a consumers' association; given the triple objective of competition law, virtually any act of unfair competition also affects the collective interests of consumers, and it is neither here nor there whether the action is brought by a competitor or an association. But Article 5 applies also to actions for injunctions brought by consumer associations. The proposed Regulation thus sits well with recent decisions of the Court of Justice on the Brussels Convention holding, for instance, that "a preventive action brought by a consumer protection organisation for the purpose of preventing a trader from using terms considered to be unfair in contracts with private individuals is a matter relating to tort, delict or quasi-delict within the meaning of Article 5(3) of that convention". [29]

[29] Case C-167/2000 Henkel (judgment given on 1.10.2002).

Comparative analysis of the Member States' private international law shows that there is a broad consensus in favour of applying the law of the country in which the market is distorted by competitive acts. This result is obtained either through the general principle of the lex loci delicti or by a specific connection (Austria, Netherlands, Spain and also Switzerland) and corresponds to recommendations extensively made by academic writers and by the Ligue internationale du droit de la concurrence en matière de publicité. [30] The current situation, however, is one of uncertainty, particularly in countries where the courts have not had an opportunity to rule on how the lex loci delicti rule should operate in practice. The establishment of a uniform conflict rule here would thus enhance the foreseeability of court decisions.

[30] Resolution passed at the Amsterdam congress in October 1992, published in the Revue internationale de la concurrence 1992 (No 168), p. 51, this Resolution having also called for an effort to harmonise the substantive rules here.

Article 5 provides for connection to the law of the State in whose territory "competitive relations or the collective interests of consumers are affected or are likely to be affected" by "an act of unfair competition". This is the market where competitors are seeking to gain the customer's favour. This solution corresponds to the victims' expectations since the rule generally designates the law governing their economic environment. But it also secures equal treatment for all operators on the same market. The purpose of competition law is to protect a market; it pursues a macro-economic objective. Actions for compensation are purely secondary and must be dependent on the overall judgement of how the market functions.

Regarding the assessment of the impact on the market, academic writers generally acknowledge that only the direct substantial effects of an act of unfair competition should be taken into account.

This is particularly important in international situations since anti-competitive conduct commonly has an impact on several markets and gives rise to the distributive application of the laws involved.

The need for a special rule here is sometimes disputed on the ground that it would lead to the same solution as the general rule in Article 3, the damage for which compensation is sought being assimilated to the anti-competitive effect on which the application of competition law depends. While the two very often coincide in territorial terms, they will not automatically do so: for instance, the question of the place where the damage is sustained is tricky where two firms from State A both operate on market B. Moreover, the rules of secondary connection, of the common residence and the exception clause are not adapted to this matter in general.

Paragraph 2 deals with situations where an act of unfair competition targets a specific competitor, as in the case of enticing away a competitor's staff, corruption, industrial espionage, disclosure of business secrets or inducing breach of contract. It is not entirely excluded that such conduct may also have a negative impact on a given market, but these are situations that have to be regarded as bilateral. There is consequently no reason why the victim should not enjoy the benefit of Article 3 relating to the common residence or the general exception clause. This solution is in conformity with recent developments in private international law: there is a similar provision in section 4(2) of the Dutch Act of 2001 and section 136(2) of the Swiss Act. The German courts take the same approach.

Article 6 - Violations of privacy and rights relating to the personality

The Regulation follows the approach generally taken by the law of the Member States nowadays and classifies violations of privacy and rights relating to the personality, particularly in the event of defamation by the mass media, in the category of non-contractual obligations rather than matters of personal status, except as regards rights to the use of a name.

There are specific provisions on respect for privacy and freedom of expression and information, also covering respect for media freedom and pluralism, in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and in the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. The Community institutions and the Member States are required to respect these fundamental values. The European Court of Human Rights has already given valuable pointers to how to reconcile the two principles in the event of defamation proceedings. International conventions have helped to approximate the rules governing freedom of the press in the Member States, but differences remain as regards the practical application of that freedom. Operators regard the foreseeability of the law applicable to their business as of the greatest importance.

A study of the conflict rules in the Member States shows that there is not only a degree of diversity in the solutions adopted but also considerable uncertainty as to the law. In the absence of codification, court decisions laying down general rules are still lacking in many Member States. [31] The connecting factors in the other Member States vary widely: the publisher' s headquarters or the place where the product was published (Germany and Italy, at the victim' s option); the place where the product was distributed and brought to the knowledge of third parties (Belgium, France, Luxembourg); the place where the victim enjoys a reputation, presumed to be his habitual residence (Austria). Other Member States follow the principle of favouring the victim, by giving the victim the option (Germany, Italy), or applying the law of the place where the damage is sustained where the lex loci delicti does not provide for compensation (Portugal). The UK solution is very different from the solutions applied in other Member States, for it differentiates depending whether the publication is distributed in the UK or elsewhere: in the former case the only law applicable is the law of the place of distribution; in the latter case the court applies both the law of the place of distribution and the lex fori ("double actionability rule"). This rule protects the national press, as the English courts cannot give judgment against it if there is no provision for this in English law. [32]

[31] Denmark, Finland, Greece, Ireland (doctrine of the "proper law of the tort"), Netherlands, Spain and Sweden.

[32] Some academic writers in England doubt, however, whether invasions of privacy are also covered by this rule.

Given the diversity and the uncertainties of the current situation, harmonising the conflict rule in the Community will increase certainty in the law.

The content of the uniform rule must reflect the rules of international jurisdiction in the "Brussels I" Regulation. The effect of the Mines de Potasse d'Alsace and Fiona Shevill judgments [33] is that the victim may sue for damages either in the courts of the State where the publisher of the defamatory material is established, which have full jurisdiction to compensate for all damage sustained, or in the courts of each State in which the publication was distributed and the victim claims to have suffered a loss of reputation, with jurisdiction to award damages only for damage sustained in their own State. Consequently, if the victim decides to bring the action in a court in a State where the publication is distributed, that court will apply its own law to the damage sustained in that State. But if the victim brings the action in the court for the place where the publisher is headquartered, that court will have jurisdiction to rule on the entire claim for damages: the lex fori will then govern the damage sustained in that country and the court will apply the laws involved on a distributive basis if the victim also claims compensation for damage sustained in other States.

[33] Case C 68/93 Fiona Shevill and others v Press Alliance SA [1995] ECR I - 415 (judgment given on 7 March 1995).

In view of the practical difficulties in the distributive application of several laws to a given situation, the Commission proposed, in its draft proposal for a Council Regulation of May 2002, that the law of the victim' s habitual residence be applied. But there was extensive criticism of this during the consultations, one of the grounds being that it is not always easy to ascertain the habitual residence of a celebrity and another being that the combination of rules of jurisdiction and conflict rules could produce a situation in which the courts of the State of the publisher' s establishment would have to give judgment against the publisher under the law of the victim' s habitual residence even though the product was perfectly in conformity with the rules of the publisher's State of establishment and no single copy of the product was distributed in the victim' s State of residence. The Commission has taken these criticisms on board and reviewed its proposal.

Article 6(1) of the proposed Regulation now provides for the law applicable to violations of privacy and rights relating to the personality to be determined in accordance with the rules in Article 3, which posit the law of the place where the direct damage is sustained, unless the parties reside in the same State or the dispute is more closely connected with another country.

In Fiona Shevill the Court of Justice ruled on the actual determination of the place where the damage was sustained in the event of defamation by the press, opting for the "State in which the publication was distributed and where the victim claims to have suffered injury to his reputation". The place where a publication is distributed is the place where it comes to the knowledge of third parties and a person' s reputation is liable to be harmed. This solution is in conformity with the victim's legitimate expectations without neglecting those of media firms. A publication can be regarded as distributed in a country only if is actually distributed there on a commercial basis.

But the Commission has been sensitive to concerns expressed both in the press and by certain Member States regarding situations in which a court in Member State A might be obliged to give judgment against a publisher with its own nationality A under the laws of Member State B, or even a third country, even though the publication in dispute was perfectly in conformity with the rules applicable in Member State A. It has been pointed out that the application of law B could be unconstitutional in country A as violating the freedom of the press. Given that this is a sensitive issue, where the Member States' constitutional rules diverge quite considerably, the Commission has felt that Article 6(1) should make it explicitly clear that the law designated by Article 3 must be disapplied in favour of the lex fori if it is incompatible with the public policy of the forum in relation to freedom of the press.

The law designated by Article 6(1) does not seem to provide a proper basis for settling the question whether and in what conditions the victim can oblige the publisher to issue a corrected version and exercise a right of reply. Paragraph 2 accordingly provides that the right of reply and equivalent measures will be governed by the law of the country in which the broadcaster or publisher is established.

Article 7 - Violation of the environment

Article 7 lays down a special rule for civil liability in relation to violations of the environment. Reflecting recent developments in the substantive law, the rule covers both damage to property and persons and damage to the ecology itself, provided it is the result of human activity.

European or even international harmonisation is particularly important here as so many environmental disasters have an international dimension. But the instruments adopted so far deal primarily with questions of substantive law or international jurisdiction rather than with harmonisation of the conflict rules. And they address only selected types of cross-border pollution. In spite of this gradual approximation of the substantive law, not only in the Community, major differences subsist - for example in determining the damage giving rise to compensation, limitation periods, indemnity and insurance rules, the right of associations to bring actions and the amounts of compensation. The question of the applicable law has thus lost none of its importance.

Analysis of the current conflict rules shows that the solutions vary widely. The lex fori and the law of the place where the dangerous activity is exercised play a certain role, particularly in the international Conventions, but the most commonly applied solution is the law of the place where the loss is sustained (France, United Kingdom, Netherlands, Spain, Japan, Switzerland, Romania, Turkey, Quebec) or one of the variants of the principle of the law that is most favourable to the victim (Germany, Austria, Italy, Czech Republic, Yugoslavia, Estonia, Turkey, Nordic Convention of 1974 on the protection of the environment, Convention between Germany and Austria of 19 December 1967 concerning nuisances generated by the operation of Salzburg airport in Germany). The Hague Conference has also put an international convention on cross-border environmental damage on its work programme, and preparatory work seems to be moving towards a major role for the place where the damage is sustained, though the merits of the principle of favouring the victim are acknowledged.

The uniform rule proposed in Article 7 takes as its primary solution the application of the general rule in Article 3(1), applying the law of the place where the damage is sustained but giving the victim the option of selecting the law of the place where the event giving rise to the damage occurred.

The basic connection to the law of the place where the damage was sustained is in conformity with recent objectives of environmental protection policy, which tends to support strict liability. The solution is also conducive to a policy of prevention, obliging operators established in countries with a low level of protection to abide by the higher levels of protection in neighbouring countries, which removes the incentive for an operator to opt for low-protection countries. The rule thus contributes to raising the general level of environmental protection.

But the exclusive connection to the place where the damage is sustained would also mean that a victim in a low-protection country would not enjoy the higher level of protection available in neighbouring countries. Considering the Union' s more general objectives in environmental matters, the point is not only to respect the victim's legitimate interests but also to establish a legislative policy that contributes to raising the general level of environmental protection, especially as the author of the environmental damage, unlike other torts or delicts, generally derives an economic benefit from his harmful activity. Applying exclusively the law of the place where the damage is sustained could give an operator an incentive to establish his facilities at the border so as to discharge toxic substances into a river and enjoy the benefit of the neighbouring country' s laxer rules. This solution would be contrary to the underlying philosophy of the European substantive law of the environment and the "polluter pays" principle.

Article 7 accordingly allows the victim to make his claim on the basis of the law of the country in which the event giving rise to the damage occurred. It will therefore be for the victim rather than the court to determine the law that is most favourable to him. The question of the stage in proceedings at which the victim must exercise his option is a question for the procedural law of the forum, each Member State having its own rules to determine the moment from which it is no longer possible to file new claims.

A further difficulty regarding civil liability for violations of the environment lies in the close link with the public-law rules governing the operator's conduct and the safety rules with which he is required to comply. One of the most frequently asked questions concerns the consequences of an activity that is authorised and legitimate in State A (where, for example, a certain level of toxic emissions is tolerated) but causes damage to be sustained in State B, where it is not authorised (and where the emissions exceed the tolerated level). Under Article 13, the court must then be able to have regard to the fact that the perpetrator has complied with the rules in force in the country in which he is in business.

Article 8 - Infringement of intellectual property rights

Article 8 lays down special rules for non-contractual obligations flowing from an infringement of intellectual property rights. According to Recital 14 the term intellectual property rights means copyright, related rights, sui generis right for protection of databases and industrial property rights.

The treatment of intellectual property was one of the questions that came in for intense debate during the Commission' s consultations. Many contributions recalled the existence of the universally recognised principle of the lex loci protectionis, meaning the law of the country in which protection is claimed on which e.g. the Bern Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works of 1886 and the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of 1883 are built. This rule, also known as the "territorial principle", enables each country to apply its own law to an infringement of an intellectual property right which is in force in its territory: counterfeiting an industrial property right is governed by the law of the country in which the patent was issued or the trade mark or model was registered; in copyright cases the courts apply the law of the country where the violation was committed. This solution confirms that the rights held in each country are independent.

The general rule contained in Article 3(1) does not appear to be compatible with the specific requirements in the field of intellectual property. To reflect this incompatibility, two approaches were discussed in the course of preparatory work. The first is to exclude the subject from the scope of the proposed Regulation, either by means of an express exclusion in Article 1 or by means of Article 25, which preserves current international conventions. The second is to lay down a special rule, and this is the approach finally adopted by the Commission with Article 8.

Article 8(1) enshrines the lex loci protectionis principle for infringements of intellectual property rights conferred under national legislation or international conventions.

Paragraph 2 concerns infringements of unitary Community rights such as the Community trade mark, Community designs and models and other rights that might be created in future such as the Community patent for which the Commission has adopted a proposal for a Council regulation [34] on 1 August 2000. The locus protectionis referring to the Community as a whole, the non contractual obligations that are covered by the present proposal for a regulation are directly governed by the unitary Community law. In case of infringements and where for a specific question the Community instrument neither contains a provision of substantive law nor a special conflict of laws' rule, Article 8(2) of the proposed regulation contains a subsidiary rule according to which the applicable law is the law of the Member State in which an act of infringement of the Community right has been committed.

Article 9 - Law applicable to non-contractual obligations arising out of an act other than a tort or delict

In all the Member States' legal systems there are obligations that arise neither out of a contract nor out of a tort or delict. The situations that are familiar to all the Member States are payments made by mistake and services rendered by a person that enable another person to avoid sustaining personal injury or loss of assets.

Since these obligations are clearly distinguished by their own features from torts and delicts, it has been decided that there should be a special section for them.

To reflect the wide divergences between national systems here, technical terms need to be avoided. This Regulation refers therefore to "non-contractual obligations arising out of an act other than a tort or delict". In most Member States there are sub-categories for repayment of amounts wrongly received or unjust enrichment on the one hand and agency without authority (negotiorum gestion) on the other. Both the substantive law and the conflict rules are still evolving rapidly in most of the Member States, which means that the law is far from certain. The uniform conflict rule must reflect the divergences in the substantive rules. The difficulty is in laying down rules that are neither so precise that they cannot be applied in a Member State whose substantive law makes no distinction between the various relevant hypotheses nor so general that they might be open to challenge as serving no obvious purpose. Article 9 seeks to overcome the problem by laying down specific rules for the two sub-categories, unjust enrichment and agency without authority, while leaving the courts with sufficient flexibility to adapt the rule their national systems.

The secondary connection technique, confirmed by paragraph 1, is particularly important here, for example where an agent exceeds his authority or where a third-party debt is settled. The rule is accordingly a strict one. The obligation is so closely connected with the pre-existing relationship between the parties that it is preferable for the entire legal situation to be governed by the same law. As in the case of the general exception clause in Article 3(3), the expression "pre-existing relationship" applies particularly to pre-contractual relationships and to void contracts.

Paragraph 2 reflects the legitimate expectations of the parties where they are habitually resident in the same country.

Paragraph 3 concerns unjust enrichment in the absence of a pre-existing relationship between the parties, in which case the non-contractual obligation is governed by the law of the country in which the enrichment occurs. The proposed rule is a conventional one, found also in the GEDIP draft and the Swiss legislation.

Paragraph 4, concerning negotiorum gestio (agency without authority), distinguishes between measures to be described as assistance and measures that might be described as interference. Measures of assistance mean one-off initiatives taken on an exceptional basis by the "agent", who deserves special protection since he acted in order to preserve the interests of the "principal", which justifies a local connection to the law of the property or person assisted. In the case of measures of interference in the assets of another person, as in the case of payment of a third-party debt, it is the "principal" who deserves protection. The applicable law is therefore generally the law of the latter' s place of habitual residence.

Paragraph 5, like the first sentence of Article 3, provides an exception clause.

To ensure that several different laws are not applicable to one and the same dispute, paragraph 6 excludes from this Article non-contractual obligations relating to intellectual property, to which Article 8 alone applies. E.g. an obligation based on unjust enrichment arising from an infringement of an intellectual property right is accordingly governed by the same law as the infringement itself.

Article 10 - Freedom of choice

Paragraph 1 allows the parties to choose the law applicable to the non-contractual obligation after the dispute has arisen. The proposed Regulation thus follows recent developments in national private international law, which likewise tend to encourage greater freedom of will, [35] even if the situation is less frequent that in contract cases. For this reason, the rule is based on objective connecting factors, unlike the Rome Convention.

[35] Examples include section 6 of the Dutch Act of 11 April 2001 and section 42 of the German EGBGB.

Freedom of will is not accepted, however, for intellectual property, where it would not be appropriate.

As in Article 3 of the Rome Convention, it is stated that the choice must either be explicit or emerge clearly from the circumstances of the case. Since the proposed Regulation does not allow an ex ante choice, there is no need for special provisions to protect a weaker party.

Paragraph 1 further specifies that the parties' choice may not affect the rights of third parties. The typical example is the insurer's obligation to reimburse damages payable by the insured.

Paragraph 2 puts a restriction on freedom of will, which is inspired by Article 3(3) of the Rome Convention and applies where all the elements of the situation (except the choice of law) are located in a country other than the one whose law is chosen. In reality this is a purely internal situation regarding a Member State and is within the scope of the Regulation only because the parties have agreed on a choice of law. The choice by the parties is not deactivated, but it may not operate to the detriment of such mandatory provisions of the law which might otherwise be applicable.

In this Article the concept of "mandatory rules", unlike the overriding mandatory rules referred to in Article 12, refers to a country' s rules of internal public policy. These are rules from which the parties cannot derogate by contract, particularly those designed to protect weaker parties. But internal public policy rules are not necessarily mandatory in an international context. They must be distinguished from the rules of international public policy of the forum referred to in Article 22 and from the overriding mandatory rules referred to in Article 12.

Paragraph 3 represents an extension by analogy of the limit provided for by paragraph 2 and applies where all the elements of the case apart from the choice of law are located in two or more Member States. It has the same objective, i.e. to prevent the parties frustrating the application of mandatory rules of Community law through the choice of the law of a third country.

Article 11 - Scope of the law applicable to non-contractual obligations

Article 11 defines the scope of the law determined under Articles 3 to 10 of the proposed Regulation. It lists the questions to be settled by that law. The approach taken in the Member States is not entirely uniform: while certain questions, such as the conditions for liability, are generally governed by the applicable law, others, such as limitation periods, the burden of proof, the measure of damages etc., may fall to be treated by the lex fori. Like Article 10 of the Rome Convention, Article 11 accordingly lists the questions to be settled by the law that is actually designated.

In line with the general concern for certainty in the law, Article 11 confers a very wide function on the law designated. It broadly takes over Article 10 of the Rome Convention, with a few changes of detail:

a) "The conditions and extent of liability, including the determination of persons who are liable for acts performed by them"; the expression "conditions... of liability" refers to intrinsic factors of liability. The following questions are particularly concerned: nature of liability (strict or fault-based); the definition of fault, including the question whether an omission can constitute a fault; the causal link between the event giving rise to the damage and the damage; the persons potentially liable; etc. "Extent of liability" refers to the limitations laid down by law on liability, including the maximum extent of that liability and the contribution to be made by each of the persons liable for the damage which is to be compensated for. The expression also includes division of liability between joint perpetrators.

b) "The grounds for exemption from liability, any limitation of liability and any division of liability": these are extrinsic factors of liability. The grounds for release from liability include force majeure; necessity; third-party fault and fault by the victim. The concept also includes the inadmissibility of actions between spouses and the exclusion of the perpetrator' s liability in relation to certain categories of persons.

c) "The existence and kinds of damage for which compensation may be due": this is to determine the damage for which compensation may be due, such as personal injury, damage to property, moral damage and environmental damage, and financial loss or loss of an opportunity.

d) "the measures which a court has power to take under its procedural law to prevent or terminate damage or to ensure the provision of compensation": this refers to forms of compensation, such as the question whether the damage can be repaired by payment of damages, and ways of preventing or halting the damage, such as an interlocutory injunction, though without actually obliging the court to order measures that are unknown in the procedural law of the forum.

e) "the measure of damages in so far as prescribed by law": if the applicable law provides for rules on the measure of damages, the court must apply them.

f) "the question whether a right to compensation may be assigned or inherited": this is self-explanatory. In succession cases, the designated law governs the question whether an action can be brought by a victim's heir to obtain compensation for damage sustained by the victim. [36] In assignment cases, the designated law governs the question whether a claim is assignable [37] and the relationship between assignor and debtor.

[36] It goes without saying that the law governing the injured party's succession applies to the determination of the heirs, this being a preliminary to the main action.

[37] Article 12(2) of the Rome Convention.

g) The law that is designated will also determine the "persons entitled to compensation for damage sustained personally": this concept particularly refers to the question whether a person other than the "direct victim" can obtain compensation for damage sustained on a "knock-on" basis, following damage sustained by the victim. Such damage might be non-material, as in the pain and suffering caused by a bereavement, or financial, as in the loss sustained by the children or spouse of a deceased person.

h) "liability for the acts of another person": this concept concerns provisions in the law designated for vicarious liability. It covers the liability of parents for their children and of principals for their agents.

i) "the manners in which an obligation may be extinguished and rules of prescription and limitation, including rules relating to the commencement of a period of prescription or limitation and the interruption and suspension of the period"; the law designated governs the loss of a right following failure to exercise it, on the conditions set by the law.

Article 12 - Overriding mandatory rules

This Article closely follows the corresponding Article of the Rome Convention.

In Arblade, the Court of Justice gave an initial definition of overriding mandatory rules (also called public-order legislation) as "national provisions compliance with which has been deemed to be so crucial for the protection of the political, social or economic order in the Member State concerned as to require compliance therewith by all persons present on the national territory of that Member State and all legal relationships within that State". [38] What is specific about them is that the courts do not even apply their own conflict rules to determine the law applicable to a given situation and to evaluate in practical terms whether its content would be repugnant to the values of the forum, but they apply their own rules as a matter of course. [39]

[38] Cases C-369/96 and C-376/96 [1999] ECR I-8453 (judgment given on 23.11.1999).

[39] This is the international public policy exception, to which Article 22 is devoted.

Paragraph 2 allows the courts to apply the overriding mandatory rules of the forum. As the Court also held in Arblade, in intra-Community relations the application of the mandatory rules of the forum must be compatible with the fundamental freedoms of the internal market. [40]

[40] Paragraph 31 of the judgment states that "The fact that national rules are categorised as public-order legislation does not mean that they are exempt from compliance with the provisions of the Treaty" and that "The considerations underlying such national legislation can be taken into account by Community law only in terms of the exceptions to Community freedoms expressly provided for by the Treaty and, where appropriate, on the ground that they constitute overriding reasons relating to the public interest".

Paragraph 1 refers to foreign mandatory rules, where the court enjoys considerable discretion if there is a close connection with the situation, depending on its nature, its purposes and the consequences of applying it. Under the Rome Convention, Germany, Luxembourg and the United Kingdom have exercised their right to refrain from applying Article 7(1), relating to foreign mandatory rules. But the Commission like most of the contributors during the written consultations sees no reason to exclude this possibility since references to foreign mandatory rules have been perfectly exceptional hitherto.

Article 13 - Rules of safety and conduct

Where the law that is designated is not the law of the country in which the event giving rise to the damage occurred, Article 13 of the proposed Regulation requires the court to take account of the rules of safety and conduct which were in force at the place and time of the relevant event.

This article is based on the corresponding articles of the Hague Conventions on traffic accidents (Article 7) and product liability (Article 9). There are equivalent principles in the conflict systems of virtually all the Member States, either in express statutory provisions or in the decided cases.

The rule in Article 13 is based on the fact that the perpetrator must abide by the rules of safety and conduct in force in the country in which he operates, irrespective of the law applicable to the civil consequences of his action, and that these rules must also be taken into consideration when ascertaining liability. Taking account of foreign law is not the same thing as applying it:

the court will apply only the law that is applicable under the conflict rule, but it must take account of another law as a point of fact, for example when assessing the seriousness of the fault or the author' s good or bad faith for the purposes of the measure of damages.

Article 14 - Direct action

Article 14 determines the law applicable to the question whether the person sustaining damage may bring a direct action against the insurer of the person liable. The proposed rule strikes a reasonable balance between the interests at stake as it protects the person sustaining damage by giving him the option, while limiting the choice to the two laws which the insurer can legitimately expect to be applied the law applicable to the non-contractual obligation and the law applicable to the insurance contract.

At all events, the scope of the insurer's obligations is determined by the law governing the insurance contract.

As in Article 7, relating to the environment, the form of words used here will avert the risk of doubts where the victim does not exercise his right of option.

Article 15 - Subrogation and multiple liability

This Article is identical to Article 13 of the Rome Convention.

It applies in particular to the relationship between insurer and perpetrator to determine whether the form has a right of action by way of subrogation against the latter.

Where there are several perpetrators, it also applies where one of the joint and several debtors makes a payment.

Article 16 - Formal validity

Article 16 is inspired by Article 9 of the Rome Convention.

Although the concept of formal validity plays a minor role in the creation of non-contractual obligations, an obligation can well arise as a result of a unilateral act by one or other of the parties.

To promote the validity of such acts, Article 16 provides for an alternative rule along the lines of Article 9 of the Rome Convention, whereby the act is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs the non-contractual obligation in question or the law of the country in which this act is done.

Article 17 - Burden of proof

Article 17 is identical to Article 14 of the Rome Convention.

It provides that the law governing non-contractual obligations applies to the extent that it contains, in matters of non-contractual obligations, rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof. This is a useful provision as questions relating to evidence are basically matters for the procedural law of the lex fori.

Paragraph 2 concerns the admissibility of modes of proving acts intended to have legal effect referred to in Article 16. It does not cover evidence of legal facts, which is also covered by the lex fori. The very liberal system of Article 14(2) of the Rome Convention is used here, providing for the alternative application of the lex fori and the law governing the form of the relevant act.

Article 18 - Assimilation to the territory of a State

Article 18 applies to situations in which one or more of the connecting factors in the conflict rules of the proposed Regulation relate to an area that is not subject to territorial sovereignty.

The text proposed by the Commission in the written consultation procedure in May 2002 contained a special conflict rule. One of the difficulties with this rule lay in the diversity of the situations concerned. It is by no means certain that a single rule will adequately cover the position of a collision between ships on the high seas, the explosion of an electronic device or the breakdown of negotiations in an aircraft in flight, pollution caused by a ship at sea etc.

The contributions received by the Commission have made it aware that the proposed rule made it all too easy to designate the law of a flag of convenience, which would be contrary to the more general objectives of Community policy. Many contributors had doubts about the value added by a rule which, where two or more laws are potentially involved, as in collision cases, merely refers to the principle of the closest connection.

Rather than introducing a special rule here, Article 18 offers a definition of the "territory of a State". This solution is founded on the need to strike a reasonable balance between divergent interests by means of the different conflict rules in the proposed Regulation where one or more connecting factors are located in an area subject to no sovereignty. The general rule in Article 3 and the special conflict rules accordingly apply.

The definitions in the proposed text are inspired by section 1 of the Dutch Act on conflicts of laws in relation to obligations arising out of unlawful acts (11 April 2001).

Article 19 - Assimilation to habitual residence

This article deals with the concept of habitual residence for companies and firms and other bodies corporate or unincorporate and for natural persons exercising a liberal profession or business activity in a self-employed capacity.

In general terms the proposed Regulation is distinguished from the "Brussels I" Regulation by the fact that, in accordance with the generally accepted solution in conflict matters, the criterion used here is not domicile but the more flexible criterion of habitual residence.

With regard to companies and firms and other bodies corporate or unincorporate, simply taking over the alternative rule in Article 60 of the "Brussels I" Regulation, whereby the domicile of a body corporate is either its registered office, or its central administration, or its principal establishment, would not make the applicable law adequately foreseeable.

Article 19(1) accordingly provides that the principal establishment of a company or firms or other body corporate or unincorporate is considered to be its habitual residence. However, the second sentence of paragraph 1 states that where the event giving rise to the damage occurs or the damage is sustained in the course of operation of a subsidiary, a branch or any other establishment, the establishment takes the place of the habitual residence. Like Article 5(5) of the "Brussels I" Regulation, the purpose of this is to respect the legitimate expectations of the parties.

Paragraph 2 determines the habitual residence of a natural person exercising a liberal profession or business activity in a self-employed capacity, for whom the professional establishment operates as habitual residence.

Article 20 - Exclusion of renvoi

This Article is identical to Article 15 of the Rome Convention.

To avoid jeopardising the objective of certainty in the law that is the main inspiration for the conflict rules in the proposed Regulation, Article 20 excludes renvoi. Consequently, designating a law under uniform conflict rules means designating the substantive rules of that law but not its rules of private international law, even where the law thus designated is that of a third country.

Article 21 - States with more than one legal system

This Article is identical to Article 19 of the Rome Convention.

The uniform rules also apply where several legal systems coexist in a single State. Where a State has several territorial units each with its own rules of law, each of those units is considered a country for the purposes of private international law. Examples of those States are the United Kingdom, Canada, the United States and Australia. For example, if damage is sustained in Scotland, the law designated by Article 3(1) is Scots law.

Article 22 - Public policy of the forum

This Article corresponds to Article 16 of the Rome Convention relating to the mechanism of the public policy exception. Like the Rome Convention, this concerns a State's public policy in the private international law sense, a more restrictive concept than public policy in the domestic law sense. The words "of the forum" have been added to distinguish the rules of public policy in the private international law sense, which proceed solely from the national law of a State, from those flowing from Community law, to which the specific rule of Article 23 applies.

The mechanism of the public policy exception allows the court to disapply rules of the foreign law designated by the conflict rule and to replace it by the lex fori where the application of the foreign law in a given case would be contrary to the public policy of the forum. This is distinguished from overriding mandatory rules: in the latter case, the courts apply the law of the forum automatically, without first looking at the content of the foreign law. The word "manifestly" incompatible with the public policy of the forum means that the use of the public policy exception must be exceptional.

In a Brussels Convention case the Court of Justice held that the concept of public policy remains a national concept and that "...it is not for the Court to define the content of the public policy of a Contracting State...", but it must none the less "review the limits within which the courts of a Contracting State may have recourse to that concept for the purpose of refusing recognition of a judgment emanating from another Contracting State". [41]

[41] Case C-38/98 Renault v Maxicar [2000] ECR I-2973 (judgment given on 11.5.2000).

Article 23 - Relationship with other provisions of Community law

Paragraph 1 refers to the traditional mechanisms of private international law that can be found in the treaties and the secondary legislation and entail special conflict rules in specific matters, mandatory rules of Community and the Community public policy exception.

Paragraph 2 refers more particularly to the specific principles of the internal market relating to the free movement of goods and services, commonly known as the "mutual recognition" and "home-country control" principles.

Article 24 - Non-compensatory damages

Article 24 is the practical application of the Community public policy exception provided for by the third indent of Article 23(1) in the form of a special rule.

In the written consultation, many contributors expressed concern at the idea of applying the law of a third country providing for damages not calculated to compensate for damage sustained. It was suggested that it would be preferable to adopt a specific rule rather than to apply the public policy exception of the forum, as is the case of section 40-III of the German EGBGB.

The effect of Article 24 is accordingly that application of a provision of the law designated by this Regulation which has the effect of causing non-compensatory damages, such as exemplary or punitive damages, to be awarded will be contrary to Community public policy.

The words used are descriptive rather than technical legal terms, too loosely tied to a specific legal system. Compensatory damages serve to compensate for damage sustained by the victim or liable to be sustained by him at a future date. Non-compensatory damages serve a punitive or deterrent function.

Article 25 - Relationship with existing international conventions

Article 25 allows Member States to go on applying choice of law rules laid down in international conventions to which they are party when this Regulation is adopted.

These conventions include the Hague Conventions on traffic accidents (4 May 1971) and product liability (2 October 1973).

Article 26 - List of conventions referred to in Article 25

To make it easier to identify the conventions to which Article 25 applies, Article 26 provides that the Member States are to notify the Commission of the list, which the Commission is then to publish in the Official Journal of the European Union. The Member States are also to notify the Commission of denunciations of these conventions so that it can update the list.

2003/0168 (COD)

Proposal for a REGULATION OF THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL ON THE LAW APPLICABLE TO NON-CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATIONS ("ROME II")

THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION,

Having regard to the Treaty establishing the European Community, and in Article 61(c) thereof,

Having regard to the proposal from the Commission, [42]

[42] OJ C [...], [...] , p. [...].

Having regard to the opinion of the European Economic and Social Committee, [43]

[43] OJ C [...], [...] , p. [...].

Acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 251 of the Treaty, [44]

[44] Opinion of the European Parliament of [...] (OJ C [...], [...] , p. [...].

Whereas:

(1) The Union has set itself the objective of establishing an area of freedom, security and justice. To that end the Community must adopt measures relating to judicial cooperation in civil matters with a cross-border impact to the extent necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market, including measures promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws and of jurisdiction.

(2) For the purposes of effectively implementing the relevant provisions of the Amsterdam Treaty, the Council (Justice and Home Affairs) on 3 December 1998 adopted a plan of action specifying that the preparation of a legal instrument on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations is among the measures to be taken within two years following the entry into force of the Amsterdam Treaty. [45]

(3) The Tampere European Council on 15 and 16 October 1999 [46] approved the principle of mutual recognition of judgments as a priority matter in the establishment of a European law-enforcement area. The Mutual Recognition Programme [47] states that measures relating to harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules are measures that "actually do help facilitate the implementation of the principle".

[47] OJ C 12, 15.1.2001, p. 1.

(4) The proper functioning of the internal market creates a need, in order to improve the predictability of the outcome of litigation, certainty as to the law and the free movement of judgments, for the rules of conflict of laws in the Member States to designate the same national law irrespective of the country of the court in which an action is brought.

(5) The scope of the Regulation must be determined in such a way as to be consistent with Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 [48] and the Rome Convention of 1980. [49]

[49] The consolidated text of the Convention as amended by the various Conventions of Accession, and the declarations and protocols annexed to it, is published in OJ C 27, 26.1.1998, p. 34.

(6) Only uniform rules applied irrespective of the law they designate can avert the risk of distortions of competition between Community litigants.

(7) The principle of the lex loci delicti commissi is the basic solution for non-contractual obligations in virtually all the Member States, but the practical application of the principle where the component factors of the case are spread over several countries is handled differently. This situation engenders uncertainty in the law.

(8) The uniform rule must serve to improve the foreseeability of court decisions and ensure a reasonable balance between the interests of the person claimed to be liable and the person who has sustained damage. A connection with the country where the direct damage occurred (lex loci delicti commissi) strikes a fair balance between the interests of the person causing the damage and the person sustaining the damage, and also reflects the modern approach to civil liability and the development of systems of strict liability.

(9) Specific rules should be laid down for special torts/delicts where the general rule does not allow a reasonable balance to be struck between the interests at stake.

(10) Regarding product liability, the conflict rule must meet the objectives of fairly spreading the risks inherent in a modern high-technology society, protecting consumers' health, stimulating innovation, securing undistorted competition and facilitating trade. Connection to the law of the place where the person sustaining the damage has his habitual residence, together with a foreseeability clause, is a balanced solution in regard to these objectives.

(11) In matters of unfair competition, the conflict rule must protect competitors, consumers and the general public and ensure that the market economy functions properly. The connection to the law of the relevant market generally satisfies these objectives, though in specific circumstances other rules might be appropriate.

(12) In view of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the Council of Europe Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the conflict must strike a reasonable balance as regards violations of privacy and rights in the personality. Respect for the fundamental principles that apply in the Member States as regards freedom of the press must be secured by a specific safeguard clause.

(13) Regarding violations of the environment, Article 174 of the Treaty, which provides that there must a high level of protection based on the precautionary principle and the principle that preventive action must be taken, the principle of priority for corrective action at source and the principle that the polluter pays, fully justifies the use of the principle of discriminating in favour of the person sustaining the damage.

(14) Regarding violations of intellectual property rights, the universally acknowledged principle of the lex loci protectionis should be preserved. For the purposes of the present Regulatio, the term intellectual property rights means copyright, related rights, sui generis right for the protection of databases and industrial property rights.

(15) Similar rules should be provided for where damage is caused by an act other than a tort or delict, such as unjust enrichment and agency without authority.

(16) To preserve their freedom of will, the parties should be allowed to determine the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation. Protection should be given to weaker parties by imposing certain conditions on the choice.

(17) Considerations of the public interest warrant giving the courts of the Member States the possibility, in exceptional circumstances, of applying exceptions based on public policy and overriding mandatory rules.

(18) The concern to strike a reasonable balance between the parties means that account must be taken of the rules of safety and conduct in operation in the country in which the harmful act was committed, even where the non-contractual obligations is governed by another law.

(19) The concern for consistency in Community law requires that this Regulation be without prejudice to provisions relating to or having an effect on the applicable law, contained in the treaties or instruments of secondary legislation other than this Regulation, such as the conflict rules in specific matters, overriding mandatory rules of Community origin, the Community public policy exception and the specific principles of the internal market. Furthermore, this regulation is not intended to create, nor shall its application lead to obstacles to the proper functioning of the internal market, in particular free movement of goods and services.

(20) Respect for international commitments entered into by the Member States means that this Regulation should not affect conventions relating to specific matters to which the Member States are parties. To make the rules easier to read, the Commission will publish the list of the relevant conventions in the Official Journal of the European Union on the basis of information supplied by the Member States.

(21) Since the objective of the proposed action, namely better foreseeability of court judgments requiring genuinely uniform rules determined by a mandatory and directly applicable Community legal instrument, cannot be adequately attained by the Member States, who cannot lay down uniform Community rules, and can therefore, by reason of its effects throughout the Community, be better achieved at Community level, the Community can take measures, in accordance with the subsidiarity principle set out in Article 5 of the Treaty. In accordance with the proportionality principle set out in that Article, a Regulation, which increases certainty in the law without requiring harmonisation of the substantive rules of domestic law, does not go beyond what is necessary to attain that objective.

(22) [In accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, these Member States have stated their intention of participating in the adoption and application of this Regulation. / In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, these Member States are not participating in the adoption of this Regulation, which will accordingly not be binding on those Member States.]

(23) In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, that Member State is not participating in the adoption of this Regulation, which will accordingly not be binding on that Member State,

HAVE ADOPTED THIS REGULATION:

Chapter I - Scope

Article 1 - Material scope

1. This Regulation shall apply, in situations involving a conflict of laws, to non-contractual obligations in civil and commercial matters.

It shall not apply to revenue, customs or administrative matters.

2. The following are excluded from the scope of this Regulation:

a) non-contractual obligations arising out of family relationships and relationships deemed to be equivalent, including maintenance obligations;

b) non-contractual obligations arising out of matrimonial property regimes and successions;

c) obligations arising under bills of exchange, cheques and promissory notes and other negotiable instruments to the extent that the obligations under such other negotiable instruments arise out of their negotiable character;

d) the personal legal liability of officers and members as such for the debts of a company or firm or other body corporate or incorporate, and the personal legal liability of persons responsible for carrying out the statutory audits of accounting documents;

e) non-contractual obligations among the settlers, trustees and beneficiaries of a trust;

f) non-contractual obligations arising out of nuclear damage.

3. For the purposes of this Regulation, "Member State" means any Member State other than [the United Kingdom, Ireland or] Denmark.

Article 2 - Universal application

Any law specified by this Regulation shall be applied whether or not it is the law of a Member State.

Chapter II - Uniform rules

Section 1 Rules applicable to non-contractual obligations arising out of a tort or delict

Article 3 - General rule

1. The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation shall be the law of the country in which the damage arises or is likely to arise, irrespective of the country in which the event giving rise to the damage occurred and irrespective of the country or countries in which the indirect consequences of that event arise.

2. However, where the person claimed to be liable and the person sustaining damage both have their habitual residence in the same country when the damage occurs, the non-contractual obligation shall be governed by the law of that country.

3. Notwithstanding paragraphs 1 and 2, where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the non-contractual obligation is manifestly more closely connected with another country, the law of that other country shall apply. A manifestly closer connection with another country may be based in particular on a pre-existing relationship between the parties, such as a contract that is closely connected with the non-contractual obligation in question.

Article 4 - Product liability

Without prejudice to Article 3(2) and (3), the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of damage or a risk of damage caused by a defective product shall be that of the country in which the person sustaining the damage is habitually resident, unless the person claimed to be liable can show that the product was marketed in that country without his consent, in which case the applicable law shall be that of the country in which the person claimed to be liable is habitually resident.

Article 5 - Unfair competition

1. The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of an act of unfair competition shall be the law of the country where competitive relations or the collective interests of consumers are or are likely to be directly and substantially affected.

2. Where an act of unfair competition affects exclusively the interests of a specific competitor, Article 3(2) and (3) shall apply.

Article 6 - Violations of privacy and rights relating to the personality

1. The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of a violation of privacy or rights relating to the personality shall be the law of the forum where the application of the law designated by Article 3 would be contrary to the fundamental principles of the forum as regards freedom of expression and information.

2. The law applicable to the right of reply or equivalent measures shall be the law of the country in which the broadcaster or publisher has its habitual residence.

Article 7 - Violation of the environment

The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of a violation of the environment shall be the law determined by the application of Article 3(1), unless the person sustaining damage prefers to base his claim on the law of the country in which the event giving rise to the damage occurred.

Article 8 - Infringement of intellectual property rights

1. The law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising from an infringement of a intellectual property right shall be the law of the country for which protection is sought.

2. In the case of a non-contractual obligation arising from an infringement of a unitary Community industrial property right, the relevant Community instrument shall apply. For any question that is not governed by that instrument, the applicable law shall be the law of the Member State in which the act of infringement is committed.

Section 2 Rules applicable to non-contractual obligations arising out of an act other than a tort or delict

Article 9 - Determination of the applicable law

1. If a non-contractual obligation arising out of an act other than a tort or delict concerns a relationship previously existing between the parties, such as a contract closely connected with the non-contractual obligation, it shall be governed by the law that governs that relationship.

2. Without prejudice to paragraph 1, where the parties have their habitual residence in the same country when the event giving rise to the damage occurs, the law applicable to the non-contractual obligation shall be the law of that country.

3. Without prejudice to paragraphs 1 and 2, a non-contractual obligation arising out of unjust enrichment shall be governed by the law of the country in which the enrichment takes place.

4. Without prejudice to paragraphs 1 and 2, the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation arising out of actions performed without due authority in connection with the affairs of another person shall be the law of the country in which the beneficiary has his habitual residence at the time of the unauthorised action. However, where a non-contractual obligation arising out of actions performed without due authority in connection with the affairs of another person relates to the physical protection of a person or of specific tangible property, the law applicable shall be the law of the country in which the beneficiary or property was situated at the time of the unauthorised action.

5. Notwithstanding paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4, where it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the non-contractual obligation is manifestly more closely connected with another country, the law of that other country shall apply.

6. Nowithstanding the present Article, all non-contractual obligations in the field of intellectual property shall be governed by Article 8.

Section 3 Common rules applicable to non-contractual obligations arising out of a tort or delict and out of an act other than a tort or delict

Article 10 - Freedom of choice

1. The parties may agree, by an agreement entered into after their dispute arose, to submit non-contractual obligations other than the obligations to which Article 8 applies to the law of their choice. The choice must be expressed or demonstrated with reasonable certainty by the circumstances of the case. It may not affect the rights of third parties.

2. If all the other elements of the situation at the time when the loss is sustained are located in a country other than the country whose law has been chosen, the choice of the parties shall be without prejudice to the application of rules of the law of that country which cannot be derogated from by contract.

3. The parties' choice of the applicable law shall not debar the application of provisions of Community law where the other elements of the situation were located in one of the Member States of the European Community at the time when the loss was sustained.

Article 11 - Scope of the law applicable to non-contractual obligations

The law applicable to non-contractual obligations under Articles 3 to 10 of this Regulation shall govern in particular:

a) the conditions and extent of liability, including the determination of persons who are liable for acts performed by them;

b) the grounds for exemption from liability, any limitation of liability and any division of liability;

c) the existence and kinds of injury or damage for which compensation may be due;

d) within the limits of its powers, the measures which a court has power to take under its procedural law to prevent or terminate injury or damage or to ensure the provision of compensation;

e) the assessment of the damage in so far as prescribed by law;

f) the question whether a right to compensation may be assigned or inherited;

g) persons entitled to compensation for damage sustained personally;

h) liability for the acts of another person;

i) the manners in which an obligation may be extinguished and rules of prescription and limitation, including rules relating to the commencement of a period of prescription or limitation and the interruption and suspension of the period.

Article 12 - Overriding mandatory rules

1. Where the law of a specific third country is applicable by virtue of this Regulation, effect may be given to the mandatory rules of another country with which the situation is closely connected, if and in so far as, under the law of the latter country, those rules must be applied whatever the law applicable to the non-contractual obligation. In considering whether to give effect to these mandatory rules, regard shall be had to their nature and purpose and to the consequences of their application or non-application.

2. Nothing in this Regulation shall restrict the application of the rules of the law of the forum in a situation where they are mandatory irrespective of the law otherwise applicable to the non-contractual obligation.

Article 13 - Rules of safety and conduct

Whatever may be the applicable law, in determining liability account shall be taken of the rules of safety and conduct which were in force at the place and time of the event giving rise to the damage.

Article 14 - Direct action against the insurer of the person liable

The right of persons who have suffered damage to take direct action against the insurer of the person claimed to be liable shall be governed by the law applicable to the non-contractual obligation unless the person who has suffered damage prefers to base his claims on the law applicable to the insurance contract.

Article 15 - Subrogation and multiple liability

1. Where a person ("the creditor") has a non-contractual claim upon another ("the debtor"), and a third person has a duty to satisfy the creditor, or has in fact satisfied the creditor in discharge of that duty, the law which governs the third person's duty to satisfy the creditor shall determine whether the third person is entitled to exercise against the debtor the rights which the creditor had against the debtor under the law governing their relationship in whole or in part.

2. The same rule shall apply where several persons are subject to the same claim and one of them has satisfied the creditor.

Article 16 - Formal validity

A unilateral act intended to have legal effect and relating to a non-contractual obligation is formally valid if it satisfies the formal requirements of the law which governs the non-contractual obligation in question or the law of the country in which this act is done.

Article 17 - Burden of proof

1. The law governing a non-contractual obligation under this Regulation applies to the extent that, in matters of non-contractual obligations, it contains rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. Acts intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognised by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 16 under which that act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

Chapter III - Other provisions

Article 18 - Assimilation to the territory of a State

For the purposes of this Regulation, the following shall be treated as being the territory of a State:

a) installations and other facilities for the exploration and exploitation of natural resources in, on or below the part of the seabed situated outside the State' s territorial waters if the State, under international law, enjoys sovereign rights to explore and exploit natural resources there;

b) a ship on the high seas which is registered in the State or bears lettres de mer or a comparable document issued by it or on its behalf, or which, not being registered or bearing lettres de mer or a comparable document, is owned by a national of the State;

c) an aircraft in the airspace, which is registered in or on behalf of the State or entered in its register of nationality, or which, not being registered or entered in the register of nationality, is owned by a national of the State.

Article 19 - Assimilation to habitual residence

1. For companies or firms and other bodies or incorporate or unincorporate, the principal establishment shall be considered to be the habitual residence. However, where the event giving rise to the damage occurs or the damage arises in the course of operation of a subsidiary, a branch or any other establishment, the establishment shall take the place of the habitual residence.

2. Where the event giving rise to the damage occurs or the damage arises in the course of the business activity of a natural person, that natural person's establishment shall take the place of the habitual residence.

3. For the purpose of Article 6 (2), the place where the broadcaster is established within the meaning of the directive 89/552/EEC, as amended by the directive 97/36/EC, shall take the place of the habitual residence.

Article 20 - Exclusion of renvoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Regulation means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law.

Article 21 - States with more than one legal system

1. Where a State comprises several territorial units, each of which has its own rules of law in respect of non-contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Regulation.

2. A State within which different territorial units have their own rules of law in respect of non-contractual obligations shall not be bound to apply this Regulation to conflicts solely between the laws of such units.

Article 22 - Public policy of the forum

The application of a rule of the law of any country specified by this Regulation may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy ("ordre public") of the forum.

Article 23 - Relationship with other provisions of Community law

1. This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of provisions contained in the Treaties establishing the European Communities or in acts of the institutions of the European Communities which:

- in relation to particular matters, lay down choice-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations; or

- lay down rules which apply irrespective of the national law governing the non-contractual obligation in question by virtue of this Regulation; or

- prevent application of a provision or provisions of the law of the forum or of the law designated by this Regulation.

2. This regulation shall not prejudice the application of Community instruments which, in relation to particular matters and in areas coordinated by such instruments, subject the supply of services or goods to the laws of the Member State where the service-provider is established and, in the area coordinated, allow restrictions on freedom to provide services or goods originating in another Member State only in limited circumstances.

Article 24 - Non-compensatory damages

The application of a provision of the law designated by this Regulation which has the effect of causing non-compensatory damages, such as exemplary or punitive damages, to be awarded shall be contrary to Community public policy.

Article 25 - Relationship with existing international conventions

This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of international conventions to which the Member States are parties when this Regulation is adopted and which, in relation to particular matters, lay down conflict-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations.

Chapter IV - Final provisions

Article 26 - List of conventions referred to in Article 25

1. The Member States shall notify the Commission, no later than 30 June 2004, of the list of conventions referred to in Article 25. After that date, the Member States shall notify the Commission of all denunciations of such conventions.

2. The Commission shall publish the list of conventions referred to in paragraph 1 in the Official Journal of the European Union within six months of receiving the full list.

Article 27 - Entry into force and application in time

— the expression 'the Union' means the European Union as established by the EU Treaty;

— the expression 'the Community' means one or both of the Communities referred to in the first indent, as the case may be;

— the expression 'new Member States' means the Republic of Bulgaria and Romania;

— the expression 'the institutions' means the institutions established by the original Treaties.

Article 2

From the date of accession, the provisions of the original Treaties and the acts adopted by the institutions and the European Central Bank before accession shall be binding on Bulgaria and Romania and shall apply in those States under the conditions laid down in those Treaties and in this Act.

Article 3

1. Bulgaria and Romania accede to the decisions and agreements adopted by the Representatives of the Governments of the Member States meeting within the Council.

2. Bulgaria and Romania are in the same situation as the present Member States in respect of declarations or resolutions of, or other positions taken up by, the European Council or the Council and in respect of those concerning the Community or the Union adopted by common agreement of the Member States; they will accordingly observe the principles and guidelines deriving from those declarations, resolutions or other positions and will take such measures as may be necessary to ensure their implementation.

3. Bulgaria and Romania accede to the conventions and protocols, listed in Annex I. Those conventions and protocols shall enter into force in relation to Bulgaria and Romania on the date determined by the Council in the decisions referred to in paragraph 4.

4. The Council, acting unanimously on a recommendation by the Commission and after consulting the European Parliament, shall make all adjustments required by reason of accession to the conventions and protocols referred to in paragraph 3 and publish the adapted text in the Official Journal of the European Union.

5. Bulgaria and Romania undertake in respect of the conventions and protocols referred to in paragraph 3 to introduce administrative and other arrangements, such as those adopted by the date of accession by the present Member States or by the Council, and to facilitate practical cooperation between the Member States' institutions and organisations.

6. The Council, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission, may supplement Annex I with those conventions, agreements and protocols signed before the date of accession.

Article 4

1. The provisions of the Schengen acquis as integrated into the framework of the European Union by the Protocol annexed to the Treaty on European Union and to the Treaty establishing the European Community (hereinafter referred to as the 'Schengen Protocol'), and the acts building upon it or otherwise related to it, listed in Annex II, as well as any further such acts adopted before the date of accession, shall be binding on and applicable in Bulgaria and Romania from the date of accession.

2. Those provisions of the Schengen acquis as integrated into the framework of the European Union and the acts building upon it or otherwise related to it not referred to in paragraph 1, while binding on Bulgaria and Romania from the date of accession, shall only apply in each of those States pursuant to a Council decision to that effect after verification in accordance with the applicable Schengen evaluation procedures that the necessary conditions for the application of all parts of the acquis concerned have been met in that State.

The Council shall take its decision, after consulting the European Parliament, acting with the unanimity of its members representing the Governments of the Member States in respect of which the provisions referred to in this paragraph have already been put into effect and of the representative of the Government of the Member State in respect of which those provisions are to be put into effect. The members of the Council representing the Governments of Ireland and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland shall take part in such a decision insofar as it relates to the provisions of the Schengen acquis and the acts building upon it or otherwise related to it in which these Member States participate.

Article 5

Bulgaria and Romania shall participate in Economic and Monetary Union from the date of accession as Member States with a derogation within the meaning of Article 122 of the EC Treaty.

Article 6

1. The agreements or conventions concluded or provisionally applied by the Community or in accordance with Article 24 or Article 38 of the EU Treaty, with one or more third States, with an international organisation or with a national of a third State, shall, under the conditions laid down in the original Treaties and in this Act, be binding on Bulgaria and Romania.

2. Bulgaria and Romania undertake to accede, under the conditions laid down in this Act, to the agreements or conventions concluded or signed by the present Member States and the Community, acting jointly.

The accession of Bulgaria and Romania to the agreements or conventions concluded or signed by the Community and the present Member States acting jointly with particular third countries or international organisations shall be agreed by the conclusion of a protocol to such agreements or conventions between the Council, acting unanimously on behalf of the Member States, and the third country or countries or international organisation concerned. The Commission shall negotiate these protocols on behalf of the Member States on the basis of negotiating directives approved by the Council, acting unanimously, and in consultation with a committee comprised of the representatives of the Member States. It shall submit a draft of the protocols for conclusion to the Council.

This procedure is without prejudice to the exercise of the Community's own competences and does not affect the allocation of powers between the Community and the Member States as regards the conclusion of such agreements in the future or any other amendments not related to accession.

3. Upon acceding to the agreements and conventions referred to in paragraph 2 Bulgaria and Romania shall acquire the same rights and obligations under those agreements and conventions as the present Member States.

4. As from the date of accession, and pending the entry into force of the necessary protocols referred to in paragraph 2, Bulgaria and Romania shall apply the provisions of the agreements or conventions concluded jointly by the present Member States and the Community before accession, with the exception of the agreement on the free movement of persons concluded with Switzerland. This obligation also applies to those agreements or conventions which the Union and the present Member States have agreed to apply provisionally.

Pending the entry into force of the protocols referred to in paragraph 2, the Community and the Member States, acting jointly as appropriate in the framework of their respective competences, shall take any appropriate measure.

5. Bulgaria and Romania accede to the Partnership Agreement between the members of the African, Caribbean and Pacific Group of States of the one part, and the European Community and its Member States, of the other part [1], signed in Cotonou on 23 June 2000.

6. Bulgaria and Romania undertake to accede, under the conditions laid down in this Act, to the Agreement on the European Economic Area [2], in accordance with Article 128 of that Agreement.

7. As from the date of accession, Bulgaria and Romania shall apply the bilateral textile agreements and arrangements concluded by the Community with third countries.

The quantitative restrictions applied by the Community on imports of textile and clothing products shall be adjusted to take account of the accession of Bulgaria and Romania to the Community. To that effect, amendments to the bilateral agreements and arrangements referred to above may be negotiated by the Community with the third countries concerned prior to the date of accession.

Should the amendments to the bilateral textile agreements and arrangements not have entered into force by the date of accession, the Community shall make the necessary adjustments to its rules for the import of textile and clothing products from third countries to take into account the accession of Bulgaria and Romania.

8. The quantitative restrictions applied by the Community on imports of steel and steel products shall be adjusted on the basis of imports of Bulgaria and Romania over recent years of steel products originating in the supplier countries concerned.

To that effect, the necessary amendments to the bilateral steel agreements and arrangements concluded by the Community with third countries shall be negotiated prior to the date of accession.

Should the amendments to the bilateral agreements and arrangements not have entered into force by the date of accession, the provisions of the first subparagraph shall apply.

9. Fisheries agreements concluded before accession by Bulgaria or Romania with third countries shall be managed by the Community.

The rights and obligations resulting for Bulgaria and Romania from those agreements shall not be affected during the period in which the provisions of those agreements are provisionally maintained.

As soon as possible, and in any event before the expiry of the agreements referred to in the first subparagraph, appropriate decisions for the continuation of fishing activities resulting from those agreements shall be adopted in each case by the Council acting by qualified majority on a proposal from the Commission, including the possibility of extending certain agreements for periods not exceeding one year.

10. With effect from the date of accession, Bulgaria and Romania shall withdraw from any free trade agreements with third countries, including the Central European Free Trade Agreement.

To the extent that agreements between Bulgaria, Romania or both those States on the one hand, and one or more third countries on the other, are not compatible with the obligations arising from this Act, Bulgaria and Romania shall take all appropriate steps to eliminate the incompatibilities established. If Bulgaria or Romania encounters difficulties in adjusting an agreement concluded with one or more third countries before accession, it shall, according to the terms of the agreement, withdraw from that agreement.

11. Bulgaria and Romania accede under the conditions laid down in this Act to the internal agreements concluded by the present Member States for the purpose of implementing the agreements or conventions referred to in paragraphs 2, 5 and 6.

12. Bulgaria and Romania shall take appropriate measures, where necessary, to adjust their position in relation to international organisations, and to those international agreements to which the Community or to which other Member States are also parties, to the rights and obligations arising from their accession to the Union.

They shall in particular withdraw at the date of accession or the earliest possible date thereafter from international fisheries agreements and organisations to which the Community is also a party, unless their membership relates to matters other than fisheries.

Article 7

1. The provisions of this Act may not, unless otherwise provided herein, be suspended, amended or repealed other than by means of the procedure laid down in the original Treaties enabling those Treaties to be revised.

2. Acts adopted by the institutions to which the transitional provisions laid down in this Act relate shall retain their status in law; in particular, the procedures for amending those acts shall continue to apply.

[2] OJ L 1, 3.1.1994, p. 3.

3. Provisions of this Act the purpose or effect of which is to repeal or amend acts adopted by the institutions, otherwise than as a transitional measure, shall have the same status in law as the provisions which they repeal or amend and shall be subject to the same rules as those provisions.

Article 8

The application of the original Treaties and acts adopted by the institutions shall, as a transitional measure, be subject to the derogations provided for in this Act.

Tendering, contracting, implementation and payments for pre-accession assistance under the Phare programme ([3]), the Phare CBC programme ([4]) and for assistance under the Transition Facility referred to in Article 31 shall be managed by implementing agencies in Bulgaria and Romania as of the date of accession.

The ex-ante control by the Commission over tendering and contracting shall be waived by a Commission decision to that effect, following an accreditation procedure conducted by the Commission and a positively assessed Extended Decentralised Implementation System (EDIS) in accordance with the criteria and conditions laid down in the Annex to Council Regulation (EC) No 1266/1999 of 21 June 1999 on coordinating aid to the applicant countries in the framework of the pre-accession strategy and amending Regulation (EEC) No 3906/89 ([5]) and in Article 164 of the Financial Regulation applicable to the general budget of the European Communities ([6]).

If this Commission decision to waive ex-ante control has not been taken before the date of accession, any contracts signed between the date of accession and the date on which the Commission decision is taken shall not be eligible for pre-accession assistance.

However, exceptionally, if the Commission decision to waive ex-ante control is delayed beyond the date of accession for reasons not attributable to the authorities of Bulgaria or Romania, the Commission may accept, in duly justified cases, eligibility for pre-accession assistance of contracts signed between the date of accession and the date of the Commission decision, and the continued implementation of pre-accession assistance for a limited period, subject to ex-ante control by the Commission over tendering and contracting.

2. Financial commitments made before accession under the pre-accession financial instruments referred to in paragraph 1 as well as those made under the Transition Facility referred to in Article 31 after accession, including the conclusion and registration of subsequent individual legal commitments and payments made after accession shall continue to be governed by the rules and regulations of the pre-accession financing

3. The last programming exercise for the pre-accession assistance referred to in paragraph 1 shall take place in the last year preceding accession. Actions under these programmes will have to be contracted within the following two years. No extensions shall be granted for the contracting period. Exceptionally and in duly justified cases, limited extensions in terms of duration may be granted for execution of contracts.

Notwithstanding this, pre-accession funds to cover administrative costs, as defined in paragraph 4, may be committed in the first two years after accession. For audit and evaluation costs, pre-accession funds may be committed up to five years after accession.

4. In order to ensure the necessary phasing out of the pre-accession financial instruments referred to in paragraph 1 and of the ISPA programme ([1]), the Commission may take all appropriate measures to ensure that the necessary statutory staff is maintained in Bulgaria and Romania for a maximum of nineteen months following accession. During this period, officials, temporary staff and contract staff assigned to posts in Bulgaria and Romania before accession and who are required to remain in service in those States after the date of accession shall benefit, as an exception, from the same financial and material conditions as were applied by the Commission before accession in accordance with the Staff Regulations of officials of the European Communities and the Conditions of Employment of other servants of the European Communities laid down in Council Regulation (EEC, Euratom, ECSC) No 259/68 ([2]). 1. Measures which on the date of accession have been the subject of decisions on assistance under Regulation (EC) No 1267/1999 establishing an Instrument for Structural Policies for Pre-accession and the implementation of which has not been completed by that date shall be considered to have been approved by the Commission under Council Regulation (EC) No 1164/94 of 16 May 1994 establishing a Cohesion Fund ([3]). Should specific transitional measures be necessary in this regard, these shall be adopted in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 50(2) of Council Regulation (EC) No 1260/1999 of 21 June 1999 laying down general provisions on the Structural Funds ([2]).

Bulgaria having closed — in line with its commitments — definitively for subsequent decommissioning Unit 1 and Unit 2 of the Kozloduy Nuclear Power Plant before the year 2003, commits to the definitive closure of Unit 3 and Unit 4 of this plant in 2006 and to subsequent decommissioning of these units.

2. During the period 2007-2009, the Community shall provide Bulgaria with financial assistance in support of its efforts to decommission and to address the consequences of the closure and decommissioning of Units 1 to 4 of the Kozloduy Nuclear Power Plant.

The assistance shall, inter alia, cover: measures in support of the decommissioning of Units 1 to 4 of the Kozloduy Nuclear Power Plant; measures for environmental upgrading in line with the acquis; measures for the modernisation of the conventional energy production, transmission and distribution sectors in Bulgaria; measures to improve energy efficiency, to enhance the use of renewable energy sources and to improve security of energy supply.

The assistance, or parts thereof, may be made available as a Community contribution to the Kozloduy International Decommissioning Support Fund, managed by the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

3. The Commission may adopt rules for implementation of the assistance referred to in paragraph 2. The rules shall be adopted in accordance with Council Decision 1999/468/EC of 28 June 1999 laying down the procedures for the exercise of implementing powers conferred on the Commission ([3]). To this end, the Commission shall be assisted by a committee. Articles 4 and 7 of Decision 1999/468/EC shall apply. The period laid down in Article 4(3) of Decision 1999/468/EC shall be six weeks. The committee shall adopt its rules of procedure.

Article 31

1. For the first year of accession, the Union shall provide temporary financial assistance, hereinafter referred to as the 'Transition Facility', to Bulgaria and Romania to develop and strengthen their administrative and judicial capacity to implement and enforce Community legislation and to foster exchange of best practice among peers. 2. Assistance shall address the continued need for strengthening institutional capacity in certain areas through action which cannot be financed by the Structural Funds or by the Rural Development funds.

3. For twinning projects between public administrations for the purpose of institution building, the procedure for call for proposals through the network of contact points in the Member States shall continue to apply, as established in the Framework Agreements with the Member States for the purpose of pre-accession assistance.

The lump-sum payments shall be used within three years from the first payment. Bulgaria and Romania shall submit, no later than six months after expiry of this three-year period, a comprehensive report on the final execution of the lump-sum payments under the Schengen part of the temporary Cash-flow and Schengen Facility with a statement justifying the expenditure. Any unused or unjustifiably spent funds shall be recovered by the Commission.

5. The Commission may adopt any technical provisions necessary for the operation of the temporary Cash-flow and Schengen Facility.

Article 35

The amounts referred to in Articles 30, 31, 32, 33 and 34 shall be adjusted by the Commission each year in line with movements in prices as part of the annual technical adjustments to the financial perspective.

TITLE IV

OTHER PROVISIONS

Article 36

1. If, until the end of a period of up to three years after accession, difficulties arise which are serious and liable to persist in any sector of the economy or which could bring about serious deterioration in the economic situation of a given area, Bulgaria or Romania may apply for authorisation to take protective measures in order to rectify the situation and adjust the sector concerned to the economy of the internal market.

In the same circumstances, any present Member State may apply for authorisation to take protective measures with regard to Bulgaria, Romania, or both those States.

2. Upon request by the State concerned, the Commission shall, by emergency procedure, determine the protective measures which it considers necessary, specifying the conditions and modalities under which they are to be put into effect.

In the event of serious economic difficulties and at the express request of the Member State concerned, the Commission shall act within five working days of the receipt of the request accompanied by the relevant background information. The measures thus decided on shall be applicable forthwith, shall take account of the interest of all parties concerned and shall not entail frontier controls.

3. The measures authorised under paragraph 2 may involve derogations from the rules of the EC Treaty and this Act to such an extent and for such periods as are strictly necessary in order to attain the objectives referred to in paragraph 1. Priority shall be given to such measures as will least disturb the functioning of the internal market.

Article 37

If Bulgaria or Romania has failed to implement commitments undertaken in the context of the accession negotiations, causing a serious breach of the functioning of the internal market, including any commitments in all sectoral policies which concern economic activities with cross-border effect, or an imminent risk of such breach the Commission may, until the end of a period of up to three years after accession, upon motivated request of a Member State or on its own initiative, take appropriate measures.

Measures shall be proportional and priority shall be given to measures which least disturb the functioning of the internal market and, where appropriate, to the application of the existing sectoral safeguard mechanisms. Such safeguard measures shall not be invoked as a means of arbitrary discrimination or a disguised restriction on trade between Member States. The safeguard clause may be invoked even before accession on the basis of the monitoring findings and the measures adopted shall enter into force as of the first day of accession unless they provide for a later date. The measures shall be maintained no longer than strictly necessary and, in any case, shall be lifted when the relevant commitment is implemented. They may however be applied beyond the period specified in the first paragraph as long as the relevant commitments have not been fulfilled. In response to progress made by the new Member State concerned in fulfilling its commitments, the Commission may adapt the measures as appropriate. The Commission shall inform the Council in good time before revoking the safeguard measures, and it shall take duly into account any observations of the Council in this respect.

If there are serious shortcomings or any imminent risks of such shortcomings in Bulgaria or Romania in the transposition, state of implementation, or the application of the framework decisions or any other relevant commitments, instruments of cooperation and decisions relating to mutual recognition in the area of criminal law under Title VI of the EU Treaty and Directives and Regulations relating to mutual recognition in civil matters under Title IV of the EC Treaty, the Commission may, until the end of a period of up to three years after accession, upon the motivated request of a Member State or on its own initiative and after consulting the Member States, take appropriate measures and specify the conditions and modalities under which these measures are put into effect.

These measures may take the form of temporary suspension of the application of relevant provisions and decisions in the relations between Bulgaria or Romania and any other Member State or Member States, without prejudice to the continuation of close judicial cooperation. The safeguard clause may be invoked even before accession on the basis of the monitoring findings and the measures adopted shall enter into force as of the first day of accession unless they provide for a later date. The measures shall be maintained no longer than strictly necessary and, in any case, shall be lifted when the shortcomings are remedied. They may however be applied beyond the period specified in the first paragraph as long as these shortcomings persist. In response to progress made by the new Member State concerned in rectifying the identified shortcomings, the Commission may adapt the measures as appropriate after consulting the Member States. The Commission shall inform the Council in good time before revoking the safeguard measures, and it shall take duly into account any observations of the Council in this respect.

1. If, on the basis of the Commission's continuous monitoring of commitments undertaken by Bulgaria and Romania in the context of the accession negotiations and in particular the Commission's monitoring reports, there is clear evidence that the state of preparations for adoption and implementation of the acquis in Bulgaria or Romania is such that there is a serious risk of either of those States being manifestly unprepared to meet the requirements of membership by the date of accession of 1 January 2007 in a number of important areas, the Council may, acting unanimously on the basis of a Commission recommendation, decide that the date of accession of that State is postponed by one year to 1 January 2008.

2. Notwithstanding paragraph 1, the Council may, acting by qualified majority on the basis of a Commission recommendation, take the decision mentioned in paragraph 1 with respect to Romania if serious shortcomings have been observed in the fulfilment by Romania of one or more of the commitments and requirements listed in Annex IX, point I.

3. Notwithstanding paragraph 1, and without prejudice to Article 37, the Council may, acting by qualified majority on the basis of a Commission recommendation and after a detailed assessment to be made in the autumn of 2005 of the progress made by Romania in the area of competition policy, take the decision mentioned in paragraph 1 with respect to Romania if serious shortcomings have been observed in the fulfilment by Romania of the obligations undertaken under the Europe Agreement [1] or of one or more of the commitments and requirements listed in Annex IX, point II.

4. In the event of a decision taken under paragraph 1, 2 or 3, the Council shall, acting by qualified majority, decide immediately upon such adjustments to this Act, including its Annexes and Appendices, as have become indispensable by reason of the postponement decision.

Article 40

In order not to hamper the proper functioning of the internal market, the enforcement of Bulgaria's and Romania's national rules during the transitional periods referred to in Annexes VI and VII shall not lead to border controls between Member States.

Article 41

If transitional measures are necessary to facilitate the transition from the existing regime in Bulgaria and Romania to that resulting from the application of the common agricultural policy under the conditions set out in this Act, such measures shall be adopted by the Commission in accordance with the procedure referred to in Article 25(2) of Council Regulation (EC) No 1784/2003 of 29 September 2003 on the common organisation of the market in cereals [2] or, as appropriate, in the corresponding Articles of the other Regulations on the common organisation of agricultural markets or the relevant procedure as determined in the applicable legislation. The transitional measures referred to in this Article may be adopted during a period of three years following the date of accession and their application shall be limited to that period. The Council, acting unanimously on a proposal from the Commission and after consulting the European Parliament, may extend this period.

The transitional measures relating to implementation of the instruments concerning the common agricultural policy not specified in this Act which are required as a result of accession shall be adopted prior to the date of accession by the Council acting by a qualified majority on a proposal from the Commission or, where they affect instruments initially adopted by the Commission, they shall be adopted by the Commission in accordance with the procedure required for adopting the instruments in question.

Article 42

If transitional measures are necessary to facilitate the transition from the existing regime in Bulgaria and Romania to that resulting from the application of the Community veterinary, phytosanitary and food safety rules, such measures shall be adopted by the Commission in accordance with the relevant procedure as determined in the applicable legislation. These measures shall be taken during a period of three years following the date of accession and their application shall be limited to that period.

Datasammenskrivning af Lov og gennemførelse af konvention om, hvilken lov der skal anvendes på kontraktlige forpligtelser, m.v.

Denne datasammenskrivning omfatter lov nr. 188 af 9. maj 1984 om gennemførelse af konvention om, hvilken lov der skal anvendes på kontraktlige forpligtelser, m.v. med de ændringer der følger af lov nr. 305 af 16. maj 1990

§ 1. Bestemmelserne i artiklerne 1-16, 18 og 19, stk. 1, i konvention af 19. juni 1980 om, hvilken lov der skal anvendes på kontraktlige forpligtelser, jfr. bilaget til denne lov (* 1), gælder her i landet.

Stk. 2. Uanset konventionens artikel 1, stk. 3, skal konventionens bestemmelser anvendes på forsikringsaftaler, som dækker risici beliggende i Det europæiske økonomiske Fællesskabs medlemsstater.

Stk. 3. Justitsministeren kan fastsætte bestemmelser til gennemførelse af lovvalgsregler i EF-direktiver. Det kan i den forbindelse fastsættes, at disse lovvalgsregler finder anvendelse i stedet for bestemmelserne i konventionen og i denne lov.

Stk. 4. Konventionens bestemmelser finder ikke anvendelse i det omfang, særlige lovvalgsregler er fastsat i andre retsforskrifter.

§ 2. I det omfang der gælder forskellige retsregler vedrørende kontraktlige forpligtelser i forskellige dele af det danske rige, skal konventionens bestemmelser i samme omfang som nævnt i § 1 anvendes ved afgørelsen af, hvilken landsdels regler der skal anvendes.

§ 3. I lov nr. 122 af 15. april 1964 om, hvilket lands retsregler der skal anvendes på løsørekøb af international karakter, indsættes i § 1, stk. 2, som nyt litra d:

§ 4. Loven træder i kraft den 1. juli 1984.

Stk. 2. Konventionens bestemmelser, jfr. §§ 1 og 2, finder med undtagelse af artikel 5 og artikel 6, stk. 1, også anvendelse på aftaler, som er indgået før lovens ikrafttræden. § 3 finder anvendelse på køb, som er indgået efter lovens ikrafttræden.

Lov nr. 305 af 16. maj 1990 indeholder følgende ikrafttrædelsesbestemmelse:

Stk. 1. § 1, nr. 2, 3, 5-11, 13-17, 22, 24-32, 34, 36, 38, 43, 47-50 og 53-56, samt § 3, nr. 1-10, 14 og 18, træder i kraft dagen efter bekendtgørelsen i Lovtidende.

»Regler om fjernsalg«.

6. Kapitel 4 affattes efter overskriften hertil således:

»Anvendelsesområde

§ 10. Reglerne i dette kapitel gælder med de i §§ 10 c-e nævnte undtagelser for fjernsalg og henvendelser med henblik på fjernsalg.

§ 10 a. Som fjernsalg betegnes aftale om køb af varer, om tjenesteydelser eller om løbende levering af varer eller tjenesteydelser, når aftalen

1) indgås ved brug af fjernkommunikation og uden, at parterne mødes, og

2) indgås som led i et system for fjernsalg, som drives af den erhvervsdrivende.

§ 10 b. Ved fjernkommunikation forstås i denne lov enhver kommunikation, der foregår, uden at forbrugeren og den erhvervsdrivende mødes fysisk.

§ 10 c. Reglerne i dette kapitel gælder ikke ved aftaler og henvendelser med henblik på indgåelse af aftale

1) om finansielle tjenesteydelser, herunder modtagelse af indlån, kreditgivning, betalingsformidling, forsikringsvirksomhed og kapitalforvaltning,

2) om opførelse af bygning,

3) som giver brugsret til fast ejendom, når aftalen er omfattet af lov om forbrugeraftaler, der giver brugsret til fast ejendom på timesharebasis, jf. dog stk. 3,

4) om andre rettigheder over fast ejendom med undtagelse af lejeaftaler,

5) der indgås ved hjælp af vareautomater eller lignende automater eller fra automatiserede forretningslokaler, og

6) om brug af offentligt tilgængelig telefonboks, når aftalen med udbyderen af telekommunikation indgås ved benyttelsen af boksen.

Stk. 2. Reglerne i dette kapitel gælder ikke for auktionssalg, der er tilrettelagt således, at en væsentlig del af de bydende normalt er til stede på auktionsstedet.

Stk. 3. Uanset stk. 1 gælder reglerne i § 12 d for de i stk. 1, nr. 3, nævnte aftaler.

§ 10 d. Reglerne i §§ 11 og 11 a om information gælder ikke ved aftaler og henvendelser om indgåelse af aftaler om

1) køb af levnedsmidler og andre varer til husholdningens løbende forbrug, der skal leveres til forbrugeren på dennes bopæl eller arbejdsplads som led i organiseret og regelmæssig vareudbringning,

2) indkvartering, transport, forplejning, herunder servering og catering, hvis det fremgår af aftalen, hvilken dag eller inden for hvilken bestemt periode den pågældende tjenesteydelse skal udføres, og

3) rekreative fritidsaktiviteter, herunder underholdnings-, idræts- og lignende kulturbegivenheder, hvis det fremgår af aftalen, hvilken dag eller inden for hvilken bestemt periode den pågældende tjenesteydelse skal udføres.

§ 10 e. Reglerne i §§ 12-12 c om fortrydelsesret gælder ikke ved de i § 10 d nævnte aftaler samt ved aftaler om

1) spil og lotteri og

2) tegning af abonnement på aviser, ugeblade og tidsskrifter.

Stk. 2. Uanset stk. 1, nr. 2, gælder reglerne om fortrydelsesret ved tegning af abonnement under eller i forbindelse med den erhvervsdrivendes telefoniske henvendelse til forbrugeren uden dennes forudgående anmodning.

Information m.v.

§ 11. Inden der indgås en aftale, skal den erhvervsdrivende give forbrugeren oplysning om

1) den erhvervsdrivendes navn og adresse,

2) varens eller tjenesteydelsens karakter og væsentligste egenskaber,

3) prisen for varen eller tjenesteydelsen, inklusive moms og alle andre afgifter,

4) vilkår om betaling, levering eller anden opfyldelse af aftalen samt om en eventuel uopsigelighedsperiode,

5) eventuelle leveringsomkostninger,

6) eventuel fortrydelsesret efter denne lov,

7) det beløb, forbrugeren skal betale for at bruge den pågældende kommunikationsteknik, hvis beløbet ikke beregnes efter grundtaksten, og

8) hvor længe oplysningerne gælder, herunder hvor længe varen eller tjenesteydelsen udbydes til den anførte pris.

Stk. 2. De i stk. 1 nævnte oplysninger skal gives i rimelig tid, inden der indgås en aftale, og oplysningerne skal være klare, tydelige og forståelige. Det skal fremgå klart, at oplysningerne gives med henblik på indgåelse af aftale, og oplysningerne skal gives på en måde, der er egnet under hensyn til den anvendte kommunikationsteknik, og som tager særligt hensyn til umyndige personer.

Stk. 3. Justitsministeren kan fastsætte nærmere regler om oplysningernes indhold og form. Justitsministeren kan endvidere fastsætte regler om yderligere oplysninger, som den erhvervsdrivende skal give.

§ 11 a. Indgås der en aftale om fjernsalg, skal de oplysninger, der er nævnt i § 11, stk. 1, nr. 1-6, meddeles forbrugeren læsbart på papir eller på et andet varigt medium, som forbrugeren råder over og har adgang til, medmindre forbrugeren allerede har modtaget oplysningerne på denne måde. Den erhvervsdrivende skal endvidere på den anførte måde give oplysning om

1) en fysisk adresse, hvor forbrugeren kan henvende sig med eventuelle klager,

2) betingelserne for brug af foreliggende garantitilsagn og reparations- og vedligeholdelsesservice og

3) tydelig oplysning om eventuel fortrydelsesret i medfør af denne lov, herunder om betingelserne for og fremgangsmåden ved brug af fortrydelsesretten samt om reglerne i § 12, stk. 2 og 3.

Stk. 2. Den erhvervsdrivende skal endvidere på den i stk. 1 nævnte måde give tydelig oplysning om vilkårene for forbrugerens opsigelse af aftalen, hvis aftalen gælder i mere end et år, eller det ikke er bestemt i aftalen, hvor længe den gælder. Ved aftaler som nævnt i kapitel 5 skal den erhvervsdrivende give oplysning om opsigelsesretten efter § 14, stk. 1-3, jf. endvidere § 14, stk. 4.

Stk. 3. De i stk. 1 og 2 nævnte oplysninger skal gives snarest muligt. Ved køb af varer, der skal overgives til forbrugeren, skal oplysningerne meddeles senest ved overgivelsen.

Stk. 4. Justitsministeren kan fastsætte regler om oplysningernes indhold og form. Justitsministeren kan endvidere fastsætte regler om yderligere oplysninger, som den erhvervsdrivende skal give.

Stk. 5. Stk. 1-4 gælder ikke ved aftale om tjenesteydelse, hvor bestilling og udførelse af tjenesteydelsen sker på én gang ved brug af fjernkommunikation, når vederlaget for ydelsen opkræves af udbyderen af det anvendte kommunikationsmiddel. Forbrugeren skal dog på begæring have den i stk. 1, nr. 1, nævnte oplysning.

Fortrydelsesret

§ 12. Ved fjernsalg kan forbrugeren træde tilbage fra aftalen i overensstemmelse med §§ 12 a og 12 b (fortrydelsesret).

Stk. 2. Ved fjernsalg af tjenesteydelser samt ved fjernsalg af varer, der skal fremstilles eller tilpasses efter forbrugerens individuelle behov, gælder den i stk. 1 nævnte fortrydelsesret kun, indtil udførelsen, fremstillingen eller tilpasningen begynder, når forbrugeren forinden har givet samtykke til, at den erhvervsdrivende kunne begynde udførelsen m.v. inden fortrydelsesfristens udløb. Denne begrænsning i fortrydelsesretten gælder dog ikke, hvis den pågældende aftale vedrører løbende levering og er indgået under eller i forbindelse med den erhvervsdrivendes telefoniske henvendelse til forbrugeren uden dennes forudgående anmodning.

Stk. 3. Ved aftale om køb af lyd- eller billedoptagelser eller edb-programmer gælder den i stk. 1 nævnte fortrydelsesret kun, så længe forbrugeren ikke har brudt forseglingen.

§ 12 a. Vil forbrugeren ved køb af varer eller aftale om løbende levering af varer bruge fortrydelsesretten, skal forbrugeren opfylde de betingelser, der er anført i stk. 3, 1. og 2. pkt., henholdsvis stk. 5, 1. og 2. pkt., senest 14 dage efter det seneste af følgende tidspunkter:

1) Den dag, forbrugeren fik varen, det første parti heraf eller den første levering i hænde, eller

2) den dag, forbrugeren modtog oplysninger i overensstemmelse med § 11 a, stk. 1, 2 og 4, jf. dog stk. 2.

Stk. 2. Den i stk. 1 nævnte frist udløber senest 3 måneder efter den dag, forbrugeren fik varen, det første parti heraf eller den første levering i hænde.

Stk. 3. Med undtagelse af de i stk. 5 nævnte tilfælde skal forbrugeren ved aftale om køb af varer eller løbende levering af varer tilbagesende eller tilbagegive det modtagne til den erhvervsdrivende. Benytter forbrugeren forsendelse, er det tilstrækkeligt, at han inden fortrydelsesfristens udløb har overgivet det modtagne til en fragtfører, som har påtaget sig forsendelsen til den erhvervsdrivende. Forbrugeren kan endvidere bruge fortrydelsesretten ved at undlade at modtage eller indløse den erhvervsdrivendes forsendelse.

Stk. 4. Omkostningerne ved at sende varen tilbage til den erhvervsdrivende påhviler forbrugeren. Har den erhvervsdrivende i henhold til aftalen leveret en erstatningsvare, fordi den pågældende vare som helhed ikke kunne leveres, påhviler omkostningerne ved tilbagesendelse dog den erhvervsdrivende.

Stk. 5. Har den erhvervsdrivende påtaget sig at afhente varen hos forbrugeren, såfremt denne bruger sin fortrydelsesret, skal forbrugeren underrette sælgeren om, at han vil bruge fortrydelsesretten. Det samme gælder ved aftale om løbende levering af varer, der er beregnet til engangsbrug, jf. stk. 3. § 6, stk. 3, finder tilsvarende anvendelse. Forbrugeren kan endvidere bruge fortrydelsesretten ved at undlade at modtage eller indløse den erhvervsdrivendes forsendelse.

Stk. 6. I de i stk. 3 nævnte tilfælde er fortrydelsesretten betinget af, at det modtagne overgives til den erhvervsdrivende på dennes forretningssted i væsentlig samme stand og mængde, hvori det var, da forbrugeren fik det i hænde. § 8, stk. 1, 2. pkt., og stk. 2, finder tilsvarende anvendelse.

Stk. 7. I de i stk. 5, 1. pkt., nævnte tilfælde er fortrydelsesretten betinget af, at forbrugeren holder det modtagne til disposition for den erhvervsdrivende i væsentlig samme stand og mængde, hvori det var, da forbrugeren fik det i hænde. § 8, stk. 1, 2. pkt., og stk. 2 og 3, finder tilsvarende anvendelse.

§ 12 b. Vil forbrugeren ved aftale om tjenesteydelser eller løbende levering af tjenesteydelser bruge fortrydelsesretten, skal forbrugeren underrette den erhvervsdrivende herom senest 14 dage efter det seneste af følgende tidspunkter:

1) Den dag, forbrugeren modtog underretning om, at aftalen var indgået, eller

2) den dag, forbrugeren modtog oplysninger i overensstemmelse med § 11 a, stk. 1, 2 og 4, jf. dog stk. 2.

Stk. 2. Den i stk. 1 nævnte frist udløber senest 3 måneder efter den dag, forbrugeren modtog underretning om, at aftalen var indgået.

Stk. 3. § 6, stk. 3 og 4, finder tilsvarende anvendelse.

§ 12 c. Træder forbrugeren tilbage fra aftalen efter §§ 12-12 b, kan den erhvervsdrivende ikke gøre krav vedrørende aftalen gældende mod forbrugeren.

Stk. 2. Har forbrugeren betalt helt eller delvis, skal den erhvervsdrivende tilbagebetale det modtagne, når forbrugeren træder tilbage fra aftalen. I de i § 12 a, stk. 3, nævnte tilfælde skal tilbagebetaling ske, så snart den erhvervsdrivende har modtaget varen og haft lejlighed til at undersøge den. I de i § 12 a, stk. 5, og § 12 b nævnte tilfælde skal tilbagebetaling ske snarest muligt efter, at forbrugerens underretning om tilbagetrædelsen er kommet frem til den erhvervsdrivende, og § 9, stk. 2, finder tilsvarende anvendelse.

Stk. 3. Beløb, som den erhvervsdrivende ikke har tilbagebetalt senest efter 30 dage, skal af den erhvervsdrivende forrentes efter reglerne i lov om renter ved forsinket betaling m.v. Fristen regnes i de i § 12 a, stk. 3, nævnte tilfælde fra den dag, den erhvervsdrivende har modtaget varen, og i de i § 12 a, stk. 5, og § 12 b nævnte tilfælde fra den dag, forbrugerens underretning om tilbagetrædelsen er kommet frem til den erhvervsdrivende.

Den erhvervsdrivendes opfyldelse af aftalen

§ 12 d. Medmindre andet er aftalt, skal den erhvervsdrivende levere sin ydelse senest 30 dage efter den dag, forbrugeren afgav bestilling eller tilbud.

Stk. 2. Misligholder den erhvervsdrivende aftalen på grund af forsinkelse, som skyldes, at den aftalte ydelse som helhed ikke kan leveres, kan forbrugeren hæve aftalen, uanset om forsinkelsen er af væsentlig betydning for ham, og den erhvervsdrivende skal underrette forbrugeren herom. Aftalevilkår, hvorefter forbrugeren bærer risikoen for, at varen eller tjenesteydelsen som helhed ikke kan leveres, er ikke bindende.

Stk. 3. Hæver forbrugeren aftalen i medfør af stk. 2, skal den erhvervsdrivende tilbagebetale eventuelle forudbetalte beløb snarest muligt efter, at den erhvervsdrivende har modtaget forbrugerens meddelelse om ophævelsen. Beløb, som den erhvervsdrivende ikke har tilbagebetalt senest 30 dage efter, at forbrugerens meddelelse er kommet frem, skal af den erhvervsdrivende forrentes efter reglerne i lov om renter ved forsinket betaling m.v.

Visse lovvalgsaftaler

§ 13. Er det i en aftale bestemt, at lovgivningen i et land uden for Det Europæiske Økonomiske Samarbejdsområde skal finde anvendelse på aftalen, gælder en sådan bestemmelse ikke i de spørgsmål om fjernsalg, der er reguleret i Europa-Parlamentets og

Rådets direktiv 97/7/EF om forbrugerbeskyttelse i forbindelse med aftaler vedrørende fjernsalg. Dette gælder dog kun, hvis det uden bestemmelsen ville være lovgivningen herom i et land inden for Det Europæiske Økonomiske Samarbejdsområde, der gjaldt for aftalen, og hvis denne lovgivning giver forbrugeren en bedre beskyttelse ved de pågældende spørgsmål om fjernsalg.«

7. Efter § 13 d indsættes:

»Kapitel 4 b

Bortfald af kreditaftaler

§ 13 e. Hvis forbrugeren påberåber sig, at en aftale efter regler i denne lov ikke er bindende, eller hvis forbrugeren træder tilbage fra en aftale efter regler i denne lov, bortfalder en hertil knyttet kreditaftale, som forbrugeren har indgået med den erhvervsdrivende, eller som på grundlag af en aftale mellem tredjemand og den erhvervsdrivende dækker den aftalte betaling helt eller delvis.

Stk. 2. Bortfalder kreditaftalen i medfør af stk. 1, kan forbrugeren ikke af den grund pålægges at betale gebyr eller erstatning til kreditgiveren.«

8. § 18, stk. 2, affattes således:

»Stk. 2. Der kan pålægges selskaber m.v. (juridiske personer) strafansvar efter reglerne i straffelovens 5. kapitel.«

I lov om markedsføring, jf. lovbekendtgørelse nr. 545 af 1. juli 1999, som ændret ved lov nr. 164 af 15. marts 2000, foretages følgende ændring:

1. Efter § 6 indsættes:

»Uanmodet henvendelse til bestemte aftagere

§ 6 a. En erhvervsdrivende må ikke rette henvendelse til nogen ved brug af elektronisk post, et automatisk opkaldssystem eller telefax med henblik på afsætning af varer, fast ejendom og andre formuegoder samt arbejds- og tjenesteydelser, medmindre den pågældende forudgående har anmodet om det.

Stk. 2. En erhvervsdrivende må ikke rette henvendelse til en bestemt fysisk person ved brug af andre midler til fjernkommunikation med henblik på afsætning som nævnt i stk. 1, hvis den pågældende over for den erhvervsdrivende har frabedt sig dette, hvis det fremgår af en fortegnelse, som udarbejdes af Det Centrale Personregister (CPR) hvert kvartal, at den pågældende har frabedt sig henvendelser, der sker i sådant markedsføringsøjemed, eller hvis den erhvervsdrivende ved undersøgelse i CPR er blevet bekendt med, at den pågældende har frabedt sig sådanne henvendelser. Ved telefonisk henvendelse til forbrugere gælder endvidere reglerne om uanmodet henvendelse i lov om visse forbrugeraftaler.

Stk. 3. Stk. 2 gælder ikke, hvis den pågældende person forudgående har anmodet om henvendelsen fra den erhvervsdrivende.

Stk. 4. Første gang en erhvervsdrivende retter henvendelse som nævnt i stk. 2 til en bestemt fysisk person, der ikke er anført i fortegnelsen fra CPR, skal den erhvervsdrivende tydeligt og på en forståelig måde oplyse om retten til at frabede sig henvendelser som nævnt i stk. 2 fra den erhvervsdrivende. Den pågældende skal samtidig gives adgang til på en nem måde at frabede sig sådanne henvendelser.

Stk. 5. Der må ikke kræves betaling for at modtage eller notere meddelelser om, at en anmodning efter stk. 1 tilbagekaldes, eller at henvendelser som nævnt i stk. 2 frabedes.

Stk. 6. Erhvervsministeren kan fastsætte nærmere regler om den erhvervsdrivendes informationspligt efter stk. 4 og om pligten til at give adgang til at frabede sig henvendelser som nævnt i stk. 2.«

I lov nr. 398 af 13. juni 1990 om kreditaftaler, som senest ændret ved lov nr. 1098 af 21. december 1994, foretages følgende ændringer:

1. I bilaget til loven indsættes i note c som 2. og 3. pkt.:

2. I bilaget til loven indsættes efter note c:

e) De benyttede løsningsmetoder skal give et resultat svarende til eksemplerne i bilag III til direktiv 87/102/EØF som ændret ved Europa-Parlamentets og Rådets direktiv 98/7/EF af 16. februar 1998.«

Stk. 1. Lovens § 1 træder i kraft den 1. juni 2000.

Stk. 2. Lovens § 2 træder i kraft den 1. juli 2000.

Stk. 3. Lovens § 3 træder i kraft den 1. juni 2000. For så vidt angår aftaler om kredit, der sikres ved pant i fast ejendom, træder bestemmelsen dog først i kraft den 8. februar 2001. 2. pkt. gælder ikke ved markedsføring af de pågældende aftaler, i det omfang kreditaftalelovens regler om beregning af årlige omkostninger i procent skal anvendes i forbindelse hermed.

Stk. 4. Justitsministeren fastsætter tidspunktet for ikrafttræden af lovens § 4.

Stk. 5. Lovens § 1, nr. 3 og 4, finder anvendelse, når aftalen er indgået eller forbrugeren har afgivet tilbud efter lovens ikrafttræden. Det samme gælder bestemmelserne i lov om visse forbrugeraftaler som affattet ved lovens § 1, nr. 6.

Bekendtgørelse af lov om, hvilket lands retsregler der skal anvendes på løsørekøb af international karakter

Herved bekendtgøres lov nr. 122 af 15. april 1964 om, hvilket lands retsregler der skal anvendes på løsørekøb af international karakter med den ændring, der følger af lov nr. 188 af 9. maj 1984, § 3.

§ 1. Denne lov finder anvendelse på løsørekøb af international karakter.

Stk. 2. Loven gælder dog ikke

a. køb af registreret skib eller luftfartøj.

b. køb af værdipapirer.

c. salg som led i en tvangsfuldbyrdelse eller i øvrigt ved rettens foranstaltning.

d. forbrugerkøb, jfr. købelovens § 4 a.

Stk. 3. Med køb ligestilles aftale om levering af løsøregenstande, som først skal tilvirkes, hvis de nødvendige materialer skal ydes af den, der skal levere genstanden.

§ 2. Loven finder ikke anvendelse på spørgsmål om parternes evne til at indgå retshandler, aftalens form eller købets retsvirkninger for andre end parterne.

§ 3. Køber og sælger kan vedtage, at købet skal være undergivet et bestemt lands retsregler. Vedtagelsen skal ske ved udtrykkelig bestemmelse eller utvetydigt fremgå af aftalen. Andre spørgsmål om, hvorvidt parterne gyldigt har vedtaget anvendelse af et bestemt lands retsregler, bedømmes efter dette lands regler.

§ 4. Har parterne ikke i overensstemmelse med bestemmelserne i § 3 vedtaget anvendelse af et bestemt lands regler, gælder reglerne i det land, hvor sælgeren havde bopæl, da han modtog bestillingen. Modtages bestillingen ved et sælgeren tilhørende forretningssted, gælder reglerne i det land, hvor forretningsstedet er beliggende.

Stk. 2. Reglerne i det land, hvor køberen har bopæl, eller hvor det forretningssted, hvorfra bestillingen er afgivet, er beliggende, finder dog anvendelse, såfremt sælgeren eller hans repræsentant har modtaget bestillingen i dette land.

Stk. 3. For køb på børs eller auktion gælder reglerne i det land, hvor børsen eller auktionen afholdes.

§ 5. Om fremgangsmåden ved undersøgelse af salgsgenstanden, frister for undersøgelsen og meddelelser vedrørende denne samt om forholdsregler, der skal træffes, hvis genstanden afvises, gælder reglerne i det land, hvor undersøgelsen skal foretages, medmindre andet udtrykkeligt er aftalt.

§ 6. En udenlandsk retsregel finder ikke anvendelse, såfremt den er uforenelig med grundlæggende danske retsprincipper.

§ 7. Tidspunktet for lovens ikrafttræden bestemmes af justitsministeren. (* 1).

I lov nr. 188 af 9. maj 1984 fastsættes i § 4, at den ændring, som angår § 1, stk. 2, litra d, træder i kraft den 1. juli 1984 og finder anvendelse på køb, som er indgået efter lovens ikrafttræden.

Lov nr. 188 af 9. maj 1984 indeholder endvidere følgende bestemmelse:

§ 5. Loven gælder ikke for Færøerne og Grønland, men kan ved kgl. anordning sættes i kraft for disse landsdele med de afvigelser, som de særlige færøske og grønlandske forhold tilsiger.

Ved deponering af registeret skal, med hensyn til fondsaktiver, Finanstilsynet registreres som berettiget i Værdipapircentralen, og med hensyn til de øvrige midler, der tjener til dækning af forsikringshensættelserne, skal disse håndpantsættes til fordel for Finanstilsynet.

Zweites Kapitel. Internationales Privatrecht

Erster Abschnitt. Verweisung, Art. 3 - 6

Zweiter Abschnitt. Recht der natürlichen Personen und der Rechtsgeschäfte, Art. 7 - 12

Dritter Abschnitt. Familienrecht, Art. 13 - 24

Vierter Abschnitt. Erbrecht, Art. 25 - 26

Fünfter Abschnitt. Schuldrecht, Art. 27 - 38

Erster Unterabschnitt. Vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse, Art. 27 - 37

Zweiter Unterabschnitt. Außervertragliche Schuldverhältnisse, Art. 38

FÜNFTER ABSCHNITT. SCHULDRECHT

Erster Unterabschnitt. Vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse

Artikel 27. Freie Rechtswahl.

(1) Der Vertrag unterliegt dem von den Parteien gewählten Recht. Die Rechtswahl muß ausdrücklich sein oder sich mit hinreichender Sicherheit aus den Bestimmungen des Vertrages oder aus den Umständen des Falles ergeben. Die Parteien können die Rechtswahl für den ganzen Vertrag oder nur für einen Teil treffen.

(2) Die Parteien können jederzeit vereinbaren, daß der Vertrag einem anderen Recht unterliegen soll als dem, das zuvor auf Grund einer früheren Rechtswahl oder auf Grund anderer Vorschriften dieses Unterabschnitts für ihn maßgebend war. Die Formgültigkeit des Vertrages nach Artikel 11 und Rechte Dritter werden durch eine Änderung der Bestimmung des anzuwendenden Rechts nach Vertragsabschluß nicht berührt.

(3) Ist der sonstige Sachverhalt im Zeitpunkt der Rechtswahl nur mit einem Staat verbunden, so kann die Wahl des Rechts eines anderen Staates - auch wenn sie durch die Vereinbarung der Zuständigkeit eines Gerichts eines anderen Staates ergänzt ist - die Bestimmungen nicht berühren, von denen nach dem Recht jenes Staates durch Vertrag nicht abgewichen werden kann (zwingende Bestimmungen).

(4) Auf das Zustandekommen und die Wirksamkeit der Einigung der Parteien über das anzuwendende Recht sind die Artikel 11, 12, 29 Abs. 3 und Artikel 31 anzuwenden.

Artikel 28. Mangels Rechtswahl anzuwendendes Recht.

(1) Soweit das auf den Vertrag anzuwendende Recht nicht nach Artikel 27 vereinbart worden ist, unterliegt der Vertrag dem Recht des Staates, mit dem er die engsten Verbindungen aufweist. Läßt sich jedoch ein Teil des Vertrages von dem Rest des Vertrages trennen und weist dieser Teil eine engere Verbindung mit einem anderen Staat auf, so kann auf ihn ausnahmsweise das Recht dieses anderen Staates angewandt werden.

(2) Es wird vermutet, daß der Vertrag die engsten Verbindungen mit dem Staat aufweist, in dem die Partei, welche die charakteristische Leistung zu erbringen hat, im Zeitpunkt des Vertragsabschlusses ihren gewöhnlichen Aufenthalt oder, wenn es sich um eine Gesellschaft, einen Verein oder eine juristische Person handelt, ihre Hauptverwaltung hat. Ist der Vertrag jedoch in Ausübung einer beruflichen oder gewerblichen Tätigkeit dieser Partei geschlossen worden, so wird vermutet, daß er die engsten Verbindungen zu dem Staat aufweist, in dem sich deren Hauptniederlassung befindet oder in dem, wenn die Leistung nach dem Vertrag von einer anderen als der Hauptniederlassung zu erbringen ist, sich die andere Niederlassung befindet. Dieser Absatz ist nicht anzuwenden, wenn sich die charakteristische Leistung nicht bestimmen läßt.

(3) Soweit der Vertrag ein dingliches Recht an einem Grundstück oder ein Recht zur Nutzung eines Grundstücks zum Gegenstand hat, wird vermutet, daß er die engsten Verbindungen zu dem Staat aufweist, in dem das Grundstück belegen ist.

(4) Bei Güterbeförderungsverträgen wird vermutet, daß sie mit dem Staat die engsten Verbindungen aufweisen, in dem der Beförderer im Zeitpunkt des Vertragsabschlusses seine Hauptniederlassung hat, sofern sich in diesem Staat auch der Verladeort oder der Entladeort oder die Hauptniederlassung des Absenders befindet. Als Güterbeförderungsverträge gelten für die Anwendung dieses Absatzes auch Charterverträge für eine einzige Reise und andere Verträge, die in der Hauptsache der Güterbeförderung dienen.

(5) Die Vermutungen nach den Absätzen 2, 3 und 4 gelten nicht, wenn sich aus der Gesamtheit der Umstände ergibt, daß der Vertrag engere Verbindungen mit einem anderen Staat aufweist.

Artikel 29. Verbraucherverträge.

(1) Bei Verträgen über die Lieferung beweglicher Sachen oder die Erbringung von Dienstleistungen zu einem Zweck, der nicht der beruflichen oder gewerblichen Tätigkeit des Berechtigten (Verbrauchers) zugerechnet werden kann, sowie bei Verträgen zur Finanzierung eines solchen Geschäfts darf eine Rechtswahl der Parteien nicht dazu führen, daß dem Verbraucher der durch die zwingenden Bestimmungen des Rechts des Staates, in dem er seinen gewöhnlichen Aufenthalt hat, gewährte Schutz entzogen wird,

1. wenn dem Vertragsabschluß ein ausdrückliches Angebot oder eine Werbung in diesem Staat vorausgegangen ist und wenn der Verbraucher in diesem Staat die zum Abschluß des Vertrages erforderlichen Rechtshandlungen vorgenommen hat,

2. wenn der Vertragspartner des Verbrauchers oder sein Vertreter die Bestellung des Verbrauchers in diesem Staat entgegengenommen hat oder

3. wenn der Vertrag den Verkauf von Waren betrifft und der Verbraucher von diesem Staat in einen anderen Staat gereist ist und dort seine Bestellung aufgegeben hat, sofern diese Reise vom Verkäufer mit dem Ziel herbeigeführt worden ist, den Verbraucher zum Vertragsabschluß zu veranlassen.

(2) Mangels einer Rechtswahl unterliegen Verbraucherverträge, die unter den in Absatz 1 bezeichneten Umständen zustande gekommen sind, dem Recht des Staates, in dem der Verbraucher seinen gewöhnlichen Aufenthalt hat.

(3) Auf Verbraucherverträge, die unter den in Absatz 1 bezeichneten Umständen geschlossen worden sind, ist Artikel 11 Abs. 1 bis 3 nicht anzuwenden. Die Form dieser Verträge unterliegt dem Recht des Staates, in dem der Verbraucher seinen gewöhnlichen Aufenthalt hat.

(4) Die vorstehenden Absätze gelten nicht für

1. Beförderungsverträge,

2. Verträge über die Erbringung von Dienstleistungen, wenn die dem Verbraucher geschuldeten Dienstleistungen ausschließlich in einem anderen als dem Staat erbracht werden müssen, in dem der Verbraucher seinen gewöhnlichen Aufenthalt hat. Sie gelten jedoch für Reiseverträge, die für einen Pauschalpreis kombinierte Beförderungs- und Unterbringungsleistungen vorsehen.

Artikel 30. Arbeitsverträge und Arbeitsverhältnisse von Einzelpersonen.

(1) Bei Arbeitsverträgen und Arbeitsverhältnissen darf die Rechtswahl der Parteien nicht dazu führen, daß dem Arbeitnehmer der Schutz entzogen wird, der ihm durch die zwingenden Bestimmungen des Rechts gewährt wird, das nach Absatz 2 mangels einer Rechtswahl anzuwenden wäre.

(2) Mangels einer Rechtswahl unterliegen Arbeitsverträge und Arbeitsverhältnisse dem Recht des Staates,

1. in dem der Arbeitnehmer in Erfüllung des Vertrages gewöhnlich seine Arbeit verrichtet, selbst wenn er vorübergehend in einen anderen Staat entsandt ist, oder

2. in dem sich die Niederlassung befindet, die den Arbeitnehmer eingestellt hat, sofern dieser seine Arbeit gewöhnlich nicht in ein und demselben Staat verrichtet, es sei denn, daß sich aus der Gesamtheit der Umstände ergibt, daß der Arbeitsvertrag oder das Arbeitsverhältnis engere Verbindungen zu einem anderen Staat aufweist; in diesem Fall ist das Recht dieses anderen Staates anzuwenden.

Artikel 31. Einigung und materielle Wirksamkeit.

(1) Das Zustandekommen und die Wirksamkeit des Vertrages oder einer seiner Bestimmungen beurteilen sich nach dem Recht, das anzuwenden wäre, wenn der Vertrag oder die Bestimmung wirksam wäre.

(2) Ergibt sich jedoch aus den Umständen, daß es nicht gerechtfertigt wäre, die Wirkung des Verhaltens einer Partei nach dem in Absatz 1 bezeichneten Recht zu bestimmen, so kann sich diese Partei für die Behauptung, sie habe dem Vertrag nicht zugestimmt, auf das Recht des Staates ihres gewöhnlichen Aufenthaltsorts berufen.

Artikel 32. Geltungsbereich des auf den Vertrag anzuwendenden Rechts.

(1) Das nach den Artikeln 27 bis 30 und nach Artikel 33 Abs. 1 und 2 auf einen Vertrag anzuwendende Recht ist insbesondere maßgebend für

1. seine Auslegung,

2. die Erfüllung der durch ihn begründeten Verpflichtungen,

3. die Folgen der vollständigen oder teilweisen Nichterfüllung dieser Verpflichtungen einschließlich der Schadensbemessung, soweit sie nach Rechtsvorschriften erfolgt, innerhalb der durch das deutsche Verfahrensrecht gezogenen Grenzen,

4. die verschiedenen Arten des Erlöschens der Verpflichtungen sowie die Verjährung und die Rechtsverluste, die sich aus dem Ablauf einer Frist ergeben.

5. die Folgen der Nichtigkeit des Vertrages.

(2) In bezug auf die Art und Weise der Erfüllung und die vom Gläubiger im Fall mangelhafter Erfüllung zu treffenden Maßnahmen ist das Recht des Staates, in dem die Erfüllung erfolgt, zu berücksichtigen.

(3) Das für den Vertrag maßgebende Recht ist insoweit anzuwenden, als es für vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse gesetzliche Vermutungen aufstellt oder die Beweislast verteilt. Zum Beweis eines Rechtsgeschäfts sind alle Beweismittel des deutschen Verfahrensrechts und, sofern dieses nicht entgegensteht, eines der nach Artikel 11 und 29 Abs. 3 maßgeblichen Rechte, nach denen das Rechtsgeschäft formgültig ist, zulässig.

Artikel 33. Übertragung der Forderung; gesetzlicher Forderungsübergang.

(1) Bei Abtretung einer Forderung ist für die Verpflichtungen zwischen dem bisherigen und dem neuen Gläubiger das Recht maßgebend, dem der Vertrag zwischen ihnen unterliegt.

(2) Das Recht, dem die übertragene Forderung unterliegt, bestimmt ihre Übertragbarkeit, das Verhältnis zwischen neuem Gläubiger und Schuldner, die Voraussetzungen, unter denen die Übertragung dem Schuldner entgegengehalten werden kann, und die befreiende Wirkung einer Leistung durch den Schuldner.

(3) Hat ein Dritter die Verpflichtung, den Gläubiger einer Forderung zu befriedigen, so bestimmt das für die Verpflichtung des Dritten maßgebende Recht, ob er die Forderung des Gläubigers gegen den Schuldner gemäß dem für deren Beziehungen maßgebenden Rechts ganz oder zu einem Teil geltend zu machen berechtigt ist. Dies gilt auch, wenn mehrere Personen dieselbe Forderung zu erfüllen haben und der Gläubiger von einer dieser Personen befriedigt worden ist.

Artikel 34. Zwingende Vorschriften.

Dieser Unterabschnitt berührt nicht die Anwendung der Bestimmungen des deutschen Rechts, die ohne Rücksicht auf das auf den Vertrag anzuwendende Recht den Sachverhalt zwingend regeln.

Artikel 35. Rück- und Weiterverweisung; Rechtsspaltung.

(1) Unter dem nach diesem Unterabschnitt anzuwendenden Recht eines Staates sind die in diesem Staat geltenden Sachvorschriften zu verstehen.

(2) Umfaßt ein Staat mehrere Gebietseinheiten, von denen jede für vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse ihre eigenen Rechtsvorschriften hat, so gilt für die Bestimmung des nach diesem Unterabschnitt anzuwendenden Rechts jede Gebietseinheit als Staat.

Artikel 36. Einheitliche Auslegung.

Bei der Auslegung und Anwendung der für vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse geltenden Vorschriften dieses Kapitels ist zu berücksichtigen, daß die ihnen zugrunde liegenden Regelungen des Übereinkommens vom 19. Juni 1980 über das auf vertragliche Schuldverhältnisse anzuwendende Recht (BGBl. 1986 II S. 809) in den Vertragsstaaten einheitlich ausgelegt und angewandt werden sollen.

Artikel 37. Ausnahmen.

Die Vorschriften dieses Unterabschnitts sind nicht anzuwenden auf

1. Verpflichtungen aus Wechseln, Schecks und anderen Inhaber- oder Orderpapieren, sofern die Verpflichtungen aus diesen anderen Wertpapieren aus deren Handelbarkeit entstehen;

2. Fragen betreffend das Gesellschaftsrecht, das Vereinsrecht und das Recht der juristischen Personen, wie zum Beispiel die Errichtung, die Rechts- und Handlungsfähigkeit, die innere Verfassung und die Auflösung von Gesellschaften, Vereinen und juristischen Personen sowie die persönliche gesetzliche Haftung der Gesellschafter und der Organe für die Schulden der Gesellschaft, des Vereins oder der juristischen Person;

3. die Frage, ob ein Vertreter die Person, für deren Rechnung er zu handeln vorgibt, Dritten gegenüber verpflichten kann, oder ob das Organ einer Gesellschaft, eines Vereins oder einer juristischen Person diese Gesellschaft, diesen Verein oder diese juristische Person gegenüber Dritten verpflichten kann;

4. Versicherungsverträge, die in dem Geltungsbereich des Vertrages zur Gründung der Europäischen Wirtschaftsgemeinschaft oder des Abkommens über den Europäischen Wirtschaftsraum belegende Risiken decken, mit Ausnahme von Rückversicherungsverträgen. Ist zu entscheiden, ob ein Risiko in diesem Gebiet belegen ist, so wendet das Gericht sein Recht an.

Amended proposal for a

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND COUNCIL REGULATION

ON THE LAW APPLICABLE TO NON-CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATIONS (ROME II)

(presented by the Commission pursuant to Article 250 (2) of the EC Treaty)

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM

1. BACKGROUND

The proposal[1] was adopted by the Commission on 22 July 2003 and transmitted to the European Parliament and the Council on the same date.

The European Economic and Social Committee adopted its Opinion on the Commission proposal on 30 June and I July 2004.[2]

The European Parliament adopted 54 amendments at first reading in plenary session on 6 July 2005.[3]

2. OBJECTI VE OF THE AMENDED PROPOSAL

The amended proposal adapts the original proposal for a Regulation on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations in the light of certain amendments passed by Parliament while reflecting proceedings in the Council.

3. COMMISSION OPINION ON THE AMENDMENTS ADOPTED BY PARLIAMENT

3.1 Amendments accepted in their entirety by the Commission

Amendments 2, 12, 17, 19, 22, 24, 35, 38, 39, 40, 44, 45, 48, 51, 52 and 53 can be accepted as presented by Parliament since they make improvements relating either to the clarity of the instrument or to questions of detail, or add material that will be potentially useful in implementing the initial proposal.

3.2 Amendments accepted by the Commission as to substance, subject to redrafting

Amendments 1, 5, 18, 20, 21, 23, 25, 28, 34, 36, 37, 46 and 49 can be accepted in principle, subject to redrafting.

Amendment 1 refers to the Rome I Regulation. But until the Regulation has been adopted, it would be preferable to refer to the future Community instrument that will replace the Rome Convention of 1980.

Amendment 5 brings non-contractual obligations based on strict liability and the capacity to incur liability in tort/delict within the scope of the Regulation. While the Commission can accept this analysis, it prefers to combine all the points concerning the scope of the Regulation in a single recital - recital 5 - without repeating all the questions already covered expressly by Article 12 (scope of the applicable law).

Amendment 18 specifies that unjust enrichment and administration of others' affairs without a mandate are to be considered as breaches of non-contractual obligations for the purposes of the Regulation. The Commission agrees with this. But to avoid making the text more cumbersome, it prefers to combine all the points concerning the scope of the Regulation in a single recital. Above all the Commission feels it is preferable to restate that there should be an autonomous and coherent interpretation of the legal concepts used in the Brussels I and Rome II instruments and the Rome Convention of 1980 - or the Community instrument that will replace it - by the Court of Justice rather than a long but inevitably incomplete list of details. This amendment also aims to exclude the liability of public administrations in respect of acts or omissions occurring in the performance of their duties from the scope of the Regulation. The Commission accepts the amendment as regards the substance but prefers the forms of words commonly used in international conventions.

Amendment 20 aims to exclude non-contractual obligations governed by specific provisions of company law or specific provisions applicable to other bodies corporate such as associations. The Commission accepts this amendment as regards the substance but proposes drafting it in simpler terms.

Amendment 21 would exclude non-contractual obligations arising from a trust. The Commission accepts the principle of the amendment but prefers to adopt the wording of the Hague Convention of 1 July 1985.

Amendment 23 would exclude liability for acts of public authority, including liability of publicly appointed office-holders. The Commission can accept the proposed solution as regards the substance but considers the amendment to be redundant in view of amendment 18.

Amendment 25 would allow certain parties who are already in a contractual relationship to choose the law applicable to their non-contractual obligation before the loss or damage is sustained. The Commission can accept the principle of an ex ante choice and agrees that the choice should be subject to strict conditions, in particular to protect the weaker party. But the conditions for the choice should be expressed in clear and simple terms. If the legal terms are not precise enough, parties might feel they were being given an incentive to litigate, which would make the procedure more cumbersome in terms of duration and cost and thus run counter to the objective pursued by the Regulation. The wording proposed by the Commission would both protect consumers and employees from ill-thought-out choices and exclude the possibility of such choices being imposed in standard contracts.

The Commission can accept the principle of amendments 28 and 34 , which would change the structure and title of the sections to make a clearer distinction between the general rule and special rules for certain categories of liability. To reflect proceedings in the Council and the differences between the Member States' legal systems, the Commission proposal makes an additional distinction between the special rules applicable to certain categories of liability and the specific rules governing unjust enrichment and administration of others' affairs.

Amendments 36 and 37 replace the single rule of Article 9 of the initial Commission proposal, applicable to all quasi-contracts, by two specific rules, one applying to unjust enrichment and the other to administration of others' affairs. The Commission can accept this additional distinction. In its amended proposal, however, it wishes to reflect certain technical improvements in the text emerging from Council proceedings.

Amendment 46 seeks to clarify the rule on direct actions against the insurer of the person liable without modifying it as to the substance. The Commission can accept the principle of redrafting the rule to make it easier to understand. But it prefers the form of words that emerged from the Council, which pursues the same objective.

Amendment 49 seeks to clarify the place where a natural person working from home has his habitual residence. The Commission can accept the principle of this clarification, but it prefers a form of words that is closer to what emerged from the Council, whereby the court would prefer the actual place where an occupation is exercised rather than an official address which might turn out to be purely fictitious.

3.3 Amendments accepted by the Commission in part

Amendment 3 would adapt recital 7 of the initial proposal to the changes made by amendment 26 relating to the general rule in Article 3. Since the Commission can only accept part of amendment 26, it will have to reject the corresponding amendment to the recital. As regards the final sentence of the amendment, restating the need to respect the intentions of the parties, the idea is already covered by recital 8 in the Commission's amended proposal.

Amendment 14 relating to rules of safety and conduct in the country where the loss or damage is sustained serves two purposes: first, to add the words in so far as is appropriate so as to emphasise even further that the application of these rules is in the discretion of the court, and second, to exclude this possibility in matters of defamation and unfair competition. The Commission can accept the proposed clarification for the first sentence of the recital. But Parliament's report offers no justification for excluding the rule in matters of defamation and unfair competition. The Commission accordingly sees no reason for depriving the perpetrators of these two categories of liability of the protection which this rule gives them.

Amendment 26 relating to the general rule in Article 3 of the initial Commission proposal can be accepted as regards the drafting improvements to paragraph 1, which confirms the rule proposed by the Commission. On the other hand, the Commission cannot accept the changes to paragraphs 2 and 3. Paragraph 2 brings in a specific rule concerning traffic accidents which would subject to two different laws the non-contractual obligation and the amount of damages. The Commission appreciates Parliament's efforts to find a fair solution for so many people who are the victims of traffic accidents but this solution, which would diverge sharply from the law in force in the Member States, cannot be adopted without prior in-depth analysis. It is accordingly proposed that the question be considered in detail in the report on the application of the Regulation, provided for by amendment 54. As regards paragraph 3, the amendment would substantially alter the spirit of the instrument. While it is specified that the exception clause available to the court really would be applied by way of exception , the current wording runs the risk of sending a message that is contrary to the foreseeability objective pursued by the Regulation. The mere fact that the paragraph lists no less than five factors that can be taken into consideration to justify activating the exception clause means that the parties and the courts will routinely check the justification for the solution that the general rule would have generated even where it is at first sight satisfactory. The Commission therefore cannot accept this part of amendment 26 and maintains its initial approach, which the Council also appears to have endorsed. But the Commission does acknowledge the significance of some of the factors listed in paragraph 3, in particular as regards the parties' shared habitual residence, a pre-existing de facto or de jure relationship or the legitimate expectations of the parties. As the first two of these are already mentioned expressly in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the initial proposal, Article 5(3) of the amended proposal now contains an express reference to the legitimate expectations of the parties.

Amendment 50, which concerns the mechanism for the public policy (ordre public) exception, first inserts a new paragraph 1a) to spell out the concept of public policy of the forum by listing reference instruments. Even though the public policy of the Member States will inevitably contain common elements, there are variations from one to another. Consequently the Commission cannot accept such a list. The proposed new paragraph 1b) addresses the issue of damages in amounts regarded as excessive, such as certain types of exemplary or punitive damages, already covered by a specific rule in Article 24 of the initial Commission proposal. Subject to drafting changes to make clear that punitive damages are not ipso facto excessive, the Commission can accept this rule being incorporated in the Article concerning the public policy of the forum. Under the proposed new paragraph 1c), only the parties would be able to rely on the exception clause. But it is for the court to ensure compliance with the fundamental values of the forum, and that task cannot be delegated to the parties, especially as they are not always legally represented. The Brussels I Regulation provides for the possibility for the court to withhold the exequatur from a judgment given in another Member State if it would be contrary to the public policy of the forum. The Commission accordingly cannot accept the proposed paragraph 1c).

Amendment 54 provides for an obligation for the Commission to report on the application of the Regulation after it is in force. While the Commission acknowledges the value of such a report, it cannot accept all the conditions provided for by the amendment. For one thing, the period of three years after adoption of the Regulation would not allow an adequate number of judgments to be given as the basis for an effective evaluation. As in the Brussels I Regulation, the Commission proposes a period of five years after the Regulation enters into force. As for the content of the report, the question of the amount of damages awarded by the courts and the elaboration of a code of ethics for the European media are way out of place in a conflict-of-laws regulation. The Commission accordingly cannot accept that these questions should be dealt with in a report on the application of this Regulation. On the other hand the Commission agrees with Parliament on the need to consider how to achieve a more uniform approach to applying foreign law in the courts of the Member States. It does not believe that the time is ripe for a legislative initiative in this respect (see amendment 43), but it can accept the idea of looking into the question in depth in the application report.

3.4 Amendments rejected

Amendments 4, 9, 10, 15 and 16 are not acceptable to the Commission as it rejects amendments 26, 30, 54 (paragraph 3), 31 and 42 to which they correspond.

Amendments 6, 7, 8, 11 and 13 would adapt the recitals to reflect the removal of several special rules for specific forms of liability as proposed in amendments 27, 29 and 33. Since the Commission cannot accept the deletion of these special rules (see above), it must logically reject the corresponding changes to the recitals. In its report, however, Parliament does not exclude the possibility of keeping the special rules, as long as their scope is clearly defined, particular as regards unfair trading practices and damage to the environment. Recitals 12, 13 and 14 of the amended proposal now accordingly refer to the relevant Community secondary legislation. The legal terminology of these Articles has also been changed to align it on that used in the secondary legislation. But while the concepts are thus better defined in Community law, it must still be borne in mind that they may be defined in broader terms than in Community law when they are used for the determination of a tort/delict for the purposes of private international law.

Amendment 27 would abolish the special rule for product liability. As in the case of the other torts/delicts such as unfair competition and environmental damage, the Commission considers that the general rule would not make it possible to foresee the applicable law with reasonable certainty. The place where the damage arises may be the result of pure chance in view of the great mobility of consumer goods (imagine a Dutch-made hairdryer, owned by a German tourist travelling in Thailand). Since in this area there are very often amicable settlements between insurers, it is particularly important to come up with a clear, foreseeable rule to facilitate such agreements. The Commission accordingly cannot accept the proposed deletion.

Amendment 29 would abolish the special rule for anti-competitive practices. The Commission cannot accept this amendment: Article 5 of the initial proposal did not seek to introduce a rule differing from the general rule on the substance but simply to determine more accurately the place where the damage arises, which is not always an easy matter. Article 7 has been slightly reworded in the amended proposal to make clear that the aim is solely to determine more accurately where the damage arises. To meet the European Parliament's requests regarding definitions, the Commission has also opted to use terminology in Article 7 of the amended proposal that is directly inspired by Directive 2005/29 of 11 May 2005. The result, a contrario , is that non-contractual obligations arising from anti-competitive practices outlawed under Articles 81 and 82 of the Treaty or equivalent rules in the Member States are not covered by Article 7; they are consequently subject to the general rule in Article 5. But in its Green Paper Damages actions for breach of the EC antitrust rules , scheduled for publication in December 2005, the Commission is planning to provoke debate on the question of the law applicable to civil actions for compensation for damage arising from an anti competitive practice. Depending on the replies, the Commission may wish to support a different solution in the course of the codecision procedure.

Amendment 57 would change the substance of the rule applicable to violations of privacy, particularly by the press. The Commission cannot accept this amendment, which is too generous to press editors rather than the victim of alleged defamation in the press and does not reflect the solution taken by a large majority of Member States. Since it is not possible to reconcile the Council's text and the text adopted by Parliament at first reading, the Commission considers that the best solution to this controversial question is to exclude all press offences and the like from the proposal and delete Article 6 of the original proposal. Other privacy violations would be covered by Article 5.

Amendment 31 would bring in a new special rule concerning damage arising from the exercise of the right to strike by employed people. The Commission is sensitive to the underlying political arguments but it cannot accept this amendment as the proposed rule is too rigid.

Amendment 32 restates that, until such time as the Community adopts detailed legislation on the law applicable to traffic accidents, Member States will either apply the 1971 Hague Convention or the general rules of the Rome II Convention. Since it is quite possible that the implementation report provided for by Article 26 of the amended proposal will confirm that the general rules of the Regulation provide a satisfactory solution, the Commission cannot commit itself now to a future legislative proposal and accordingly rejects this amendment. Paragraph 2 of this amendment reiterates the proposal made in amendment 26 as regards the introduction of a new special rule on the evaluation of the damage arising from a traffic accident, which the Commission cannot accept (see above under amendment 26).

Amendment 33 would delete the special rule for damage to the environment. The Commission cannot accept this amendment as the proposed rule reflects the polluter pays principle promoted by the Community and already applied in several Member States. The Greens, incidentally, abstained from voting on this amendment in plenary.

Amendment 41 again raises the question of the evaluation of the damages, which would generally (except as regards traffic accidents) be governed by the lex fori. The Commission cannot accept this amendment. This is a vital question for victims not only of traffic accidents but of any other situations, in particular personal injury, and the rules laid down by the Regulation offer a fair solution reflecting, the legitimate expectations both of the victim and of the person causing the damage.

Amendments 42 and 43 address the question of the application of foreign law by the court. The former would require the parties to indicate the law applicable in their statement of claim. The Commission is in favour of making things easier for courts dealing with international litigation, but this rule would be too difficult to implement as parties are not all capable of stating what law is applicable to their situation, in particular when they are not legally represented. The purpose of the latter is to formalise the rule already in operation in some Member States that the court must itself determine the content of the foreign law, though it can seek help from the parties. The Commission is of the opinion that, as matters stand, most Member States would not be able to apply the rule as they do not have proper structures in place to enable the courts to apply the foreign law in this way, and it rejects this amendment. But it agrees that this is an avenue well worth exploring and that special attention should be paid to it in the implementation report.

Amendment 47 is redundant with amendment 22, which the Commission prefers on drafting grounds. Amendment 47 is accordingly rejected.

4. CONCLUSION

Acting under Article 250(2) of the EC Treaty, the Commission amends its proposal as follows.

2003/0168 (COD)

Amended proposal for a

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND COUNCIL REGULATION

ON THE LAW APPLICABLE TO NON-CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATIONS (ROME II)

THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT AND THE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION,

Having regard to the Treaty establishing the European Community, and in particular Article 61(c) thereof,

Having regard to the proposal from the Commission,[4]

Having regard to the opinion of the European Economic and Social Committee,[5]

Acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 251 of the Treaty,[6]

Whereas:

(1) The Union has set itself the objective of establishing an area of freedom, security and justice. To that end the Community must adopt measures relating to judicial cooperation in civil matters with a cross-border impact to the extent necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market, including measures promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws and of jurisdiction.

(2) For the purposes of effectively implementing the relevant provisions of the Amsterdam Treaty, the Council (Justice and Home Affairs) on 3 December 1998 adopted a plan of action specifying that the preparation of a legal instrument on the law applicable to non-contractual obligations is among the measures to be taken within two years following the entry into force of the Amsterdam Treaty.[7]

(3) The Tampere European Council on 15 and 16 October 1999[8] approved the principle of mutual recognition of judgments as a priority matter in the establishment of a European law-enforcement area. The mutual recognition programme[9] states that measures relating to harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules are measures that actually do help facilitate the implementation of the principle.

(4) The proper functioning of the internal market creates a need, in order to improve the foreseeability of the outcome of litigation, certainty as to the law and the free movement of judgments, for the rules of conflict of laws in the Member States to designate the same national law irrespective of the country of the court in which an action is brought.

(5) The scope and provisions of the this Regulation, which are subject to autonomous interpretation by the Court of Justice, must be determined in such a way as to be consistent with Regulation (EC) No 44/2001[10] of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (Brussels I), [11] the Rome Convention of 1980[12][13]. and the Community instrument which will replace it. This Regulation will accordingly apply not only to actions for compensation for damage that has already arisen but also to actions to prevent likely future damage. It also covers obligations based on rules imposing strict liability.

(6) Only uniform rules applied irrespective of the law they designate can avert the risk of distortions of competition between Community litigants.

(7) The principle of the lex loci delicti commissi is the basic solution for non-contractual obligations in virtually all the Member States, but the practical application of the principle where the component factors of the case are spread over several countries is handled differently. This situation engenders uncertainty in the law.

(7) The concern for consistency in Community law requires that this Regulation be without prejudice to provisions relating to or having an effect on the applicable law, contained in the treaties or instruments of secondary legislation other than this Regulation, such as conflict rules in specific matters, overriding mandatory rules of Community origin, and the basic legal principles of the internal market. As a result, this Regulation should promote the proper functioning of the internal market, in particular the free movement of goods and services.

(8) To respect the intentions of the parties, they must be able to make an express choice as to the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation. However, their choice should be subject to certain conditions, and consumers and employees should have no possibility of choosing the applicable law before the event from which the damage occurs.

(9) The principle of the lex loci delicti commissi is the basic solution for non-contractual obligations in virtually all the Member States, but the practical application of the principle where the component factors of the case are spread over several countries is handled differently. This situation engenders uncertainty in the law.

(8 10) The uniform rule must serve to improve the foreseeability of court decisions and ensure a reasonable balance between the interests of the person claimed to be liable and the person who has sustained damage. A connection with the country where the direct damage occurred (lex loci delicti commissi) strikes a fair balance between the interests of the person causing the damage and the person sustaining the damage, and also reflects the modern approach to civil liability and the development of systems of strict liability.

(9 11) Specific rules should be laid down for special torts/delicts where the general rule does not allow a reasonable balance to be struck between the interests at stake.

(10 12) Regarding product liability, as penalised under Directive 374/1985/EEC of 25 July 1985 on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States concerning liability for defective products,[14] the conflict rule must meet the objectives of fairly spreading the risks inherent in a modern high-technology society, protecting consumers' health, stimulating innovation, securing undistorted competition and facilitating trade. Connection to the law of the place where the person sustaining the damage has his habitual residence, together with a foreseeability clause, is a balanced solution in regard to these objectives.

(11 13) In matters of unfair competition commercial practices, as penalised under Directive 29/2005/EC of 11 May 2005 concerning unfair business-to-consumer commercial practices in the internal market,[15] the general conflict rule must makes it possible to protect competitors, consumers and the general public and ensure that the market economy functions properly. The connection to the law of the relevant market generally satisfies these objectives, though in specific circumstances other rules might be appropriate The provision in a specific Article that the place where the damage occurs is the place where the market is affected helps to increase certainty as to the law.

(12) In view of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and the Council of Europe Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, the conflict must strike a reasonable balance as regards violations of privacy and rights in the personality. Respect for the fundamental principles that apply in the Member States as regards freedom of the press must be secured by a specific safeguard clause.

(1314) Regarding violations of the environment, environmental damage to which Directive 35/2004/EC of 21 April 2004 on environmental liability with regard to the prevention and remedying of environmental damage [16] applies, the solution of allowing the person sustaining the loss to choose the applicable law is fully compliant with Article 174 of the Treaty, which provides that there must a high level of protection based on the precautionary principle and the principle that preventive action must be taken, the principle of priority for corrective action at source and the principle that the polluter pays fully justifies the use of the principle of discriminating in favour of the person sustaining the damage.

(1415) Regarding violations of intellectual property rights, the universally acknowledged principle of the lex loci protectionis should be preserved. For the purposes of this Regulation, the term intellectual property rights means copyright, related rights, sui generis right for the protection of databases and industrial property rights.

(1516) Similar Special rules should be laid down for non-contractual obligations arising from provided for where damage is caused by an act other than a tort or delict, such as unjust enrichment and agency without authority.

(16) To preserve their freedom of will, the parties should be allowed to determine the law applicable to a non-contractual obligation. Protection should be given to weaker parties by imposing certain conditions on the choice.

(17) Considerations of the public interest warrant giving the courts of the Member States the possibility, in exceptional circumstances, of applying exceptions based on public policy and overriding mandatory rules

(18) The concern to strike a reasonable balance between the parties means that account must be taken of the rules of safety and conduct in operation in the country in which the harmful act was committed, even where the non-contractual obligation is governed by another law, in so far as is appropriate.

(19) The concern for consistency in Community law requires that this Regulation be without prejudice to provisions relating to or having an effect on the applicable law, contained in the treaties or instruments of secondary legislation other than this Regulation, such as the conflict rules in specific matters, overriding mandatory rules of Community origin, the Community public policy exception and the specific principles of the internal market. Furthermore, this regulation is not intended to create, nor shall its application lead to obstacles to the proper functioning of the internal market, in particular free movement of goods and services.

(2019) Respect for international commitments entered into by the Member States means that this Regulation should not affect conventions relating to specific matters to which the Member States are parties. To make the rules easier to read, the Commission will publish the list of the relevant conventions in the Official Journal of the European Union on the basis of information supplied by the Member States.

(2120) Since the objective of the proposed action, namely better foreseeability of court judgments requiring genuinely uniform rules determined by a mandatory and directly applicable Community legal instrument, cannot be adequately attained by the Member States, who cannot lay down uniform Community rules, and can therefore, by reason of its effects throughout the Community, be better achieved at Community level, the Community can take measures, in accordance with the subsidiarity principle set out in Article 5 of the Treaty. In accordance with the proportionality principle set out in that Article, a regulation, which increases certainty in the law without requiring harmonisation of the substantive rules of domestic law, does not go beyond what is necessary to attain that objective.

(2221) [In accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, these Member States have stated their intention of participating in the adoption and application of this Regulation./ In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, these Member States are not participating in the adoption of this Regulation, which will accordingly not be binding on those Member States.]

(2322) In accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark, annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, that Member State is not participating in the adoption of this Regulation, which will accordingly not be binding on that Member State,

HAVE ADOPTED THIS REGULATION:

Where a third person, for example an insurer, has a duty to satisfy a creditor in respect of a non-contractual obligation, the right of that third person to take action against the person owing the non-contractual obligation shall be governed by the law applicable to the duty to satisfy the third person's claim, for example under an insurance contract.

obligation in question or the law of the country in which this act is done.

Article 1719 - Evidence

1. The law governing a non-contractual obligation under this Regulation applies to the extent that, in matters of non-contractual obligations, it contains rules which raise presumptions of law or determine the burden of proof.

2. Acts intended to have legal effect may be proved by any mode of proof recognised by the law of the forum or by any of the laws referred to in Article 1618 under which that act is formally valid, provided that such mode of proof can be administered by the forum.

3. For the purpose of Article 6(2), the place where the broadcaster is established within the meaning of the directive 89/552/EEC, as amended by the directive 97/36/EC, shall take the place of the habitual residence.

Article 2021 - Exclusion of renvoi

The application of the law of any country specified by this Regulation means the application of the rules of law in force in that country other than its rules of private international law.

Article 2122 - States with more than one legal system

1. Where a State comprises several territorial units, each of which has its own rules of law in respect of non-contractual obligations, each territorial unit shall be considered as a country for the purposes of identifying the law applicable under this Regulation.

2. A State within which different territorial units have their own rules of law in respect of non-contractual obligations shall not be bound to apply this Regulation to conflicts solely between the laws of such units.

Article 2223 - Public policy of the forum

The application of a rule of the law of any country specified by this Regulation may be refused only if such application is manifestly incompatible with the public policy (ordre public) of the forum. In particular, the application under this Regulation of a law that would have the effect of causing non-compensatory damages to be awarded that would be excessive may be considered incompatible with the public policy of the forum.

Article 2324 - Relationship with other provisions of Community law international conventions

1. This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of provisions contained in the Treaties establishing the European Communities or in acts of the institutions of the European Communities which: This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of multilateral international conventions to which the Member States are parties when this Regulation is adopted and which, in relation to particular matters, lay down conflict-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations and of which the Commission has been notified in accordance with Article 26.

- -in relation to particular matters, lay down choice-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations; or

- -lay down rules which apply irrespective of the national law governing the non-contractual obligation in question by virtue of this Regulation; or

- -prevent application of a provision or provisions of the law of the forum or of the law designated by this Regulation.

2. This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of Community instruments which, in relation to particular matters and in areas coordinated by such instruments, subject the supply of services or goods to the laws of the Member State where the service-provider is established and, in the area coordinated, allow restrictions on freedom to provide services or goods originating in another Member State only in limited circumstances.

Article 24 - Non-compensatory damages

The application of a provision of the law designated by this Regulation which has the effect of causing non-compensatory damages, such as exemplary or punitive damages, to be awarded shall be contrary to Community public policy.

Article 25 - Relationship with existing international conventions

This Regulation shall not prejudice the application of international conventions to which the Member States are parties when this Regulation is adopted and which, in relation to particular matters, lay down conflict-of-law rules relating to non-contractual obligations.

2. However, where, at the time of conclusion of the contract, all the material aspects of the situation are located in one or more Member States, this Regulation shall take precedence over the following Conventions:

- the Hague Convention of 4 May 1971 on the Law Applicable to Traffic Accidents;

- the Hague Convention of 2 October 1973 on the Law Applicable to Products Liability.

Chapter IV - Final provisions

Article 2625 - List of conventions referred to in Article 2524

1. The Member States shall notify the Commission, no later than 30 June 2004 ..., of the list of conventions referred to in Article 2524. After that date, the Member States shall notify the Commission of all denunciations of such conventions.

2. The Commission shall publish the list of conventions referred to in paragraph 1 in the Official Journal of the European Union within six months of receiving the full that list.

Article 2726 - Implementation report

Not later than five years after this Regulation enters into force, the Commission shall submit to the European Parliament, the Council and the European Economic and Social Committee a report on its application. If necessary, this report shall be accompanied by proposals to adapt the Regulation.

In making its report, the Commission shall pay particular attention to the effects of the way in which foreign law is treated in the courts of the Member States. If necessary, the report shall include recommendations as to the desirability of a common approach to the application of foreign law.

The report shall consider whether Community legislation specifically dealing with the law applicable to traffic accidents ought to be proposed.

Article 27 - Entry into force and application in time

This Regulation shall enter into force on 1 January 2005....

It shall apply to non-contractual obligations arising out of acts occurring after its entry into force.

This Regulation shall be binding in its entirety and directly applicable in all Member States in accordance with the Treaty establishing the European Community.

COMPETENCE ET LOI APPLICABLE EN MATIERE MATRIMONIALE (ROME III)

La Commission a soumis une proposition le 18 juillet 2006 modifiant le règlement Bruxelles II bis. L'objectif de la proposition dite Rome III est de créer la possibilité que les époux, dans le cadre d'une procédure de divorce ou de séparation de corps, puissent choisir de commun accord le for compétent et de définir la loi applicable dans le cadre de ces litiges. Si aucune loi n'est choisie par les époux, le texte introduirait des règles de conflit de lois. Selon la proposition, il y a une série de règles de rattachement : le divorce est régi par la loi du pays de résidence habituelle des deux époux ; à défaut, par celle du pays de la dernière résidence habituelle des époux si l'un d'eux y réside toujours ; à défaut, par celle du pays de la nationalité commune des époux ; ou, à défaut, par la loi du for. Les règles de conflit de lois prévues dans la proposition visent à faire en sorte que, quel que soit le lieu où les époux présentent leur demande de divorce, les tribunaux d'un État membre appliquent normalement le même droit matériel (en évitant le "forum shopping").

Lors de sa session de 5 et 6 juin 2008, le Conseil avait constaté l'absence d'unanimité pour faire aboutir le règlement Rome III et l'existence de difficultés insurmontables qui rendaient impossible toute unanimité dans un avenir proche.

Le Conseil des 24 et 25 juillet 2008 a eu un débat sur l'état de la procédure concernant un instrument relatif à la compétence et la loi applicable en matière matrimoniale (Rome III), notamment en cas de divorce.

Il a pris acte de l'intention d'au moins huit États membres d'inviter la Commission à présenter une proposition de coopération renforcée et que d'autres sont susceptibles d'y participer suite à la proposition de la Commission.

L'invitation éventuelle de ces États à la Commission serait sans préjudice de la suite de le procédure et, en particulier, de l'autorisation que le Conseil sera ultérieurement appelé à accorder.

Certains États membres ont émis des doutes quant au fait que la coopération renforcée soit appropriée dans ce cas.

Quelques États membres ont indiqué ne pas avoir l'intention de participer à l'instrument mais n'ont pas de réserve sur la coopération renforcée.

La Commission s'est montrée disposée à examiner une demande formelle de présentation d'une coopération renforcée par au moins huit Etats membres mais n'a pas voulu préjuger la teneur de la proposition qu'elle présenterait dans ce cas. Elle a souligné qu'elle examinerait cette demande en tenant compte des aspects politiques, juridiques et pratiques d'une telle proposition.

Proposal for a

amending Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 as regards jurisdiction and introducing rules concerning applicable law in matrimonial matters

(presented by the Commission) {SEC(2006) 949}{SEC(2006) 950}

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM

GROUNDS FOR AND OBJECTIVES OF THE PROPOSAL ¦

10 ¦ The Treaty of Amsterdam sets out the objective of progressively establishing a common area of freedom, security and justice, amongst others by adopting measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters. Pursuant to Article 65 of the Treaty, the Community shall adopt measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters having cross-border implications insofar as they are necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market. Article 65 (b) specifically refers to measures "promoting the compatibility of the rules applicable in the Member States concerning the conflict of laws and of jurisdiction". The harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules facilitates the mutual recognition of judgments. The fact that courts of the Member States apply the same conflict-of-law rules to determine the law applicable to a given situation reinforces the mutual trust in judicial decisions given in other Member States.[1] The European Council has invoked the question of applicable law to divorce on two occasions. The European Council in Vienna requested in 1998 that the possibility of drawing up a legal instrument on the law applicable to divorce be considered within five years of the entry into force of the Treaty of Amsterdam.[2] More recently, the European Council called upon the Commission in November 2004 to present a Green Paper on the conflict-of-law rules in matters relating to divorce in 2005.[3] ¦

120 ¦ General context The growing mobility of citizens within the European Union has led to an increasing number of international couples, i.e. spouses of different nationalities, spouses who live in different Member States or who live in a Member State in which one or both of them are not nationals. In view of the high divorce rate in the European Union, applicable law and jurisdiction in matrimonial matters concern a significant number of citizens each year. Section 3 of the attached Impact Assessment contains statistics on the number of international divorces and marriages within the European Union. Existing provisions in the area of the proposal There are currently no Community rules in the field of applicable law in matrimonial matters. The first Community instrument adopted in the area of family law, Council Regulation (EC) No 1347/2000[4], set out rules on jurisdiction, recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial matters as well as judgments on parental responsibility for children of both spouses given in the context of a matrimonial proceeding. It did not, however, include rules on applicable law. The entry into force of Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003[5], which repealed and replaced Council Regulation (EC) No 1347/2001 as of 1 March 2005, did not entail any change in this respect. The question of applicable law was not invoked during the negotiations of this Regulation, which took over virtually unchanged the provisions on matrimonial matters from Council Regulation (EC) 1347/2000. Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 allows spouses to choose between several alternative grounds of jurisdiction. Once a matrimonial proceeding is brought before the courts of a Member State, the applicable law is determined on the basis of the national conflict-of-law rules of that State, which are based on very different criteria. The majority of Member States determine the applicable law on the basis of a scale of connecting factors that seek to ensure that the proceeding is governed by the legal order with which it has the closest connection. Other Member States apply systematically their domestic laws ("lex fori") to matrimonial proceedings. Objectives of the Proposal The overall objective of this Proposal is to provide a clear and comprehensive legal framework in matrimonial matters in the European Union and ensure adequate solutions to the citizens in terms of legal certainty, predictability, flexibility and access to court. The current situation may give rise to a number of problems in matrimonial proceedings of an international nature. The fact that national laws are very different both with regard to the substantive law and the conflict-of-law rules leads to legal uncertainty. The great differences between and complexity of the national conflict-of-law rules make it very difficult for international couples to predict which law will apply to their matrimonial proceeding. The large majority of Member States do not provide any possibility for the spouses to choose applicable law in matrimonial proceedings. This may lead to the application of a law with which the spouses are only tenuously connected and to a result that does not correspond to the legitimate expectations of the citizens. In addition, the current rules may induce a spouse to "rush to court", i.e. to seise a court before the other spouse has done so to ensure that the proceeding is governed by a particular law in order to safeguard his or her interests. Finally, the current rules do not guarantee sufficient access to court. The Proposal amends Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 as regards jurisdiction and applicable law in matrimonial matters to attain the following objectives: Strengthening legal certainty and predictability The Proposal introduces harmonised conflict-of-law rules in matters of divorce and legal separation to enable spouses to easily predict which law that will apply to their matrimonial proceeding. The proposed rule is based in the first place on the choice of the spouses. The choice is confined to laws with which the marriage has a close connection to avoid the application of "exotic" laws with which the spouses have little or no connection. In the absence of choice, the applicable law is determined on the basis of a scale of connecting factors which will ensure that the matrimonial proceeding is governed by a legal order with which the marriage has a close connection. This will greatly enhance legal certainty and predictability for the spouses concerned as well as for practitioners. Increasing flexibility by introducing limited party autonomy There is currently very limited place for party autonomy in matrimonial matters. The national conflict-of-law rules foresee in principle only one solution in a given situation, e.g. the application of the law of the common nationality of the spouses or the application of the law of the forum. The proposal renders the legal framework more flexible by introducing a limited possibility for the spouses to choose (a) applicable law and (b) the competent court in proceedings concerning divorce and legal separation. To allow spouses to come to an agreement on these matters could be particularly useful in cases of divorce by mutual consent. Special safeguards are introduced to ensure that the spouses are aware of the consequences of their choice. Ensuring access to court The proposal seeks also to improve access to court in matrimonial proceedings. The possibility to choose the competent court in proceedings relating to divorce and legal separation ("prorogation") will enhance access to court for spouses who are of different nationalities. The rule on prorogation applies regardless of whether the couple lives in a Member State or in a third State. In addition, the proposal specifically addresses the need to ensure access to court for spouses of different nationalities who live in a third State. The proposal introduces a uniform and exhaustive rule on residual jurisdiction in order to enhance legal certainty and ensure access to court in matrimonial matters for spouses who live in a third State but would like to bring proceedings in a Member State with which they have a close connection. Preventing rush to court by one spouse Finally, the Proposal addresses the problem of rush to court by one spouse, i.e. where one spouse applies for divorce before the other spouse has done so to ensure that the proceeding is governed by a law to safeguard his or her own interests. This may lead to the application of a law with which the defendant does not feel closely connected or which fails to take into account his or her interests. It further renders reconciliation efforts difficult and leaves little time for mediation. The introduction of harmonised conflict-of-law rules are likely to greatly reduce the risk of "rush to court", since any court seised within the Community would apply the law designated on the basis of common rules. ¦

140 ¦ Consistency with the other policies and objectives of the Union The Proposal respects the fundamental rights and observes the principles recognised in particular by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union as general principles of Community law. In particular, it seeks to ensure full respect for the right to a fair trial as recognised in Article 47 of the Charter. ¦

CONSULTATION OF INTERESTED PARTIES AND IMPACT ASSESSMENT ¦

Consultation of interested parties ¦

211 ¦ The Commission presented a Green Paper on applicable law and jurisdiction matters in divorce matters on 14 March 2005.[6] The Green Paper identified a number of shortcomings under the current situation and identified different possible policy options to address the problems. The options included status quo, harmonisation of the conflict-of-law rules, introducing a limited possibility for the spouses to choose the applicable law, revising the grounds of jurisdiction listed in Article 3 of Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003, revising Article 7 on residual jurisdiction of Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003, introducing a limited possibility for the spouses to choose the competent court,introducing a limited possibility to transfer a case and finally a combination of the different solutions. The Commission received approximately 65 submissions in response to the Green Paper.[7] In its opinion of 28 September 2005 on the Green Paper, the European Economic and Social Committee welcomed the initiative taken by the Commission. The Commission organised a public hearing on 6 December 2005. An expert meeting was subsequently held on 14 March 2006. The discussions took place on the basis of a discussion paper drawn up by the services of the Commission. ¦

212 ¦ The majority of the responses acknowledged the need to enhance legal certainty and predictability, to introduce a limited party autonomy and to prevent "rush to court". Certain stakeholders expressed concerns that the harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules would oblige courts to apply foreign law and that this may lead to delays and additional costs in matrimonial proceedings. The consultation with interested parties has been taken into account in the preparation of this Proposal. ¦

Collection and use of expertise ¦

229 ¦ There was no need for external expertise. ¦

230 ¦ Impact assessment The Commission has undertaken an impact assessment which is attached to the proposal. The Impact Assessment envisages the following options: (i) status quo, (ii) increased cooperation between Member States; (iii) harmonisation of the conflict-of-law rules including a limited possibility for spouses to choose the applicable law; (iv) revision of the rule on general jurisdiction of Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003, (v) introduction of a limited possibility for spouses to choose competent court and (vi) revision of the rule on residual jurisdiction of Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003. It results from the impact assessment that a combination of Community actions is necessary to tackle the various problems. The report advocates a revision of Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 including a harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules with a limited possibility for the spouses to choose the applicable law, the introduction of prorogation and a revision of the rule of residual jurisdiction in Article 7. ¦

231 ¦ The Commission carried out an impact assessment listed in the Work Programme, whose report is accessible on http:europa.eu.int/comm/justice_home/news/consulting_public/news_consulting_pub lic_en.htm. ¦

LEGAL ELEMENTS OF THE PROPOSAL ¦

310 ¦ Legal basis The legal basis for this proposal is Article 61 (c) of the Treaty conferring powers on the Community to adopt measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters as provided for in Article 65. Article 65 confers legislative powers on the Community with regard to judicial cooperation in civil matters having cross-border implications in so far as necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market. Article 65 (b) explicitly mentions measures promoting the compatibility of conflict-of-law rules and jurisdiction rules. The proposal concerns provisions of jurisdiction and applicable law which only come into play in international situations, e.g. where spouses live in different Member States or are of different nationalities. The cross-border requirement in Article 65 is consequently fulfilled. The Community institutions have a certain margin of discretion in determining whether a measure is necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market. The present proposal facilitates the proper functioning of the internal market since it will eliminate any obstacles to the free movement of persons who are currently faced with problems due to the remaining differences between the national laws with regard to applicable law and jurisdiction in matrimonial matters. ¦

329 ¦ Subsidiarity principle The objectives of the Proposal cannot be accomplished by the Member States but require action at Community level in the form of common rules on jurisdiction and applicable law. Jurisdiction rules as well as conflict-of-law rules must be identical to ensure the objective of legal certainty and predictability for the citizens. Unilateral action by Member States would therefore run counter this objective. There is no international convention in force between Member States on the question of applicable law in matrimonial matters. The public consultation and the impact assessment have demonstrated that the scale of the problems addressed in this proposal is significant and that it concerns thousands of citizens each year. In light of the nature and the scale of the problem, the objectives can only be achieved at Community level. ¦

Proportionality principle ¦

331 ¦ The Proposal complies with the principle of proportionality in that it is strictly limited to what is necessary to achieve its objectives. The proposed rules on applicable law and prorogation are limited to divorce and legal separation and do not apply to marriage annulment. ¦

332 ¦ It is expected that the present proposal will not entail any additional financial or administrative burdens on citizens and only a very limited additional burden on national authorities. ¦

342 ¦ With regard to the type of legislative instrument, the nature and the objective of the proposal require the form of Regulation. The need for legal certainty and predictability calls for clear and uniform rules. The proposed rules on jurisdiction and applicable law are detailed and precise and require no implementation into national law. To leave Member States any margin of discretion for the implementation of these rules would endanger the objectives of legal certainty and predictability. ¦

BUDGETARY IMPLICATION ¦

409 ¦ The proposal has no implication for the Community budget. ¦

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION ¦

510 ¦ Simplification ¦

511 ¦ The proposal provides a simplification of administrative procedures for citizens as well as for practitioners. ¦

514 ¦ In particular the harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules would considerably simplify the situation for private parties and practitioners, who will be able to determine the applicable law on the basis of one single set of rules which will replace the existing twenty-four national conflict-of-law rules. ¦

516 ¦ The proposal is included in the Commission's rolling programme for up-date and simplification of the acquis communautaire. ¦

570 ¦ Detailed explanation of the proposal Chapter II - Jurisdiction Article 3a This provision introduces a limited possibility for the spouses to designate by common agreement the competent court ("prorogation") in a proceeding relating to divorce and legal separation. It corresponds to Article 12 of Council Regulation No 2201/2003, which allows the parties to agree on the competent court in matters of parental responsibility under certain conditions. This enhanced party autonomy will improve legal certainty and predictability for the spouses. The current jurisdiction rules do not allow spouses to apply for divorce in a Member State of which only one of them is a national in the absence of another connecting factor. The new rule will in particular improve access to court for spouses of different nationalities by enabling them to designate by common agreement a court or the courts of a Member State of which one of them is a national. This possibility applies to spouses living in a Member State as well as spouses living in third States. Spouses who designate a competent court may also avail themselves of the possibility to choose the applicable law pursuant to Article 20a. Certain formal requirements need to be respected to ensure that both spouses are aware of the consequences of their choice. The possibility to choose the competent court does not apply to proceedings relating to marriage annulment where party autonomy is considered inappropriate. Articles 4 and 5 are amended to take account of the new rule on prorogation. Article 6 is deleted. The public consultation revealed that this provision may cause confusion. It is also superfluous since Articles 3, 4 and 5 describe in which circumstances a court has exclusive competence where a spouse is habitually resident in the territory of a Member State or is a national of a Member State, or in the case of the United Kingdom and Ireland, has his or her "domicile" in the territory of one of the latter States. Article 7 Article 7 currently refers to the national rules on international jurisdiction in situations where the spouses are not habitually resident in the territory of a Member State and do not have common nationality. However, the national rules are based on different criteria and do not always effectively ensure access to court for spouses although they may have a close connection with the Member State in question. This may lead to situations where no jurisdiction in the EU or in a third State has jurisdiction to deal with an application for divorce, legal separation or marriage annulment. It may also lead to practical difficulties to have the divorce recognised in a Member State since a decision issued in a third State is not recognised in a Member State pursuant to Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003, but only pursuant to national rules or applicable international treaties. The Proposal introduces a uniform and exhaustive rule on residual jurisdiction which replaces the national rules on residual jurisdiction and which ensures access to court for spouses who live in a third States but retain strong links with a certain Member State of which they are nationals or in which they have resided for a certain period. The scope of this rule corresponds to the general rule of jurisdiction in Article 3 and applies to divorce, legal separation and marriage annulment. Article 12 Article 12 is amended to ensure that a divorce court chosen by the spouses pursuant to Article

3a has jurisdiction also in matters of parental responsibility connected with the divorce application provided the conditions set out in Article 12 are met, in particular that the jurisdiction is in the best interests of the child. Chapter IIa Applicable law in matters of divorce and legal separation The Commission proposes to introduce harmonised conflict-of-law rules in matters of divorce and legal separation, based in the first place on the choice of the spouses. The choice is confined to laws with which the spouses have a close connection by virtue of their last common habitual residence if one of them still resides there, the nationality of one of the spouses, the law of the State of their previous habitual residence or the law of the forum. The majority of the respondents to the Green Paper considered that common conflict-of-law rules should apply to legal separation and divorce, since legal separation is in many cases the necessary precursor to divorce. The Member States that recognise legal separation apply the same conflict-of-law rules to divorce and legal separation. By contrast, most stakeholders were not in favour of extending these rules to marriage annulment, which is closely linked to the validity of the marriage and generally governed by the law of the State where the marriage was celebrated ("lex loci celebrationis") or the law of the nationality of the spouses ("lex patriae"). Article 20a The vast majority of the national conflict-of-law rules only foresee one solution in a given situation. The proposal seeks to enhance the flexibility of the spouses by allowing them to choose the law applicable to divorce and legal separation. The laws available are confined to the laws with which the spouses have a close connection. The rule includes certain procedural requirements to ensure that the spouses are aware of the consequences of their choice. Article 20b In the absence of choice by the parties, the applicable law would be determined on the basis of a scale of connecting factors, based in the first place on the habitual residence of the spouses. This uniform rule will ensure legal certainty and predictability. The introduction of harmonised conflict-of-law rules is likely to greatly reduce the risk of "rush to court" since any court seised within the Community would apply the law designated on the basis of common rules. The fact that the rule is based in the first place on the habitual residence of the spouses and, failing that, on their last habitual residence if one of them still resides there will result in the application of the law of the forum in the vast majority of cases. The problems relating to the application of foreign law will therefore be scarce. Article 20c Although this is not explicitly stated in the text, the proposed Regulation is meant to be of universal application, meaning that the conflict-of-law rule can designate the law of a Member State of the European Union or the law of a third State. Where the law of another Member State is designated, the European Judicial Network in civil and commercial matters can play a role in assisting the courts on the contents of foreign law. Article 20d To allow renvoi would jeopardise the objective of legal certainty. The designation of a law under the uniform conflict-of-law rules consequently means designating the substantive rules of that law and not its rule of private international law. Article 20e The mechanism of the public policy exception allows the court to disregard the rules of the foreign law designated by the conflict-of-law rule where the application of the foreign law in a given case would be contrary to the public policy of the forum. The word "manifestly" incompatible means that the use of the public policy exception must be exceptional. Position of the United Kingdom, Ireland and Denmark The United Kingdom and Ireland do not participate in co-operation in matters covered by Title IV of the Treaty unless they give notice of their wish to take part in accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community. Denmark is not participating in the adoption of this Regulation and is not bound by it nor subject to its application by virtue of Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community. ¦

amending Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 as regards jurisdiction and introducing rules concerning applicable law in matrimonial matters

T HE COUNCIL OF THE EUROPEAN UNION,

Having regard to the Treaty establishing the European Community, and in particular Article 61(c) and Article 67(1) thereof,

Having regard to the proposal from the Commission[8],

Having regard to the opinion of the European Parliament[9],

Having regard to the opinion of the European Economic and Social Committee[10],

Whereas:

(1) The European Union has set itself the objective of maintaining and developing the European Union as an area of freedom, security and justice in which the movement of persons is ensured. For the gradual establishment of such an area, the Community is to adopt, among others, the measures relating to judicial cooperation in civil matters needed for the proper functioning of the internal market.

(2) There are currently no Community rules in the field of applicable law in matrimonial matters. Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 of 27 November 2003 sets out rules on jurisdiction, recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial matters and matters of parental responsibility, but does not include rules on applicable law.

(3) The European Council held in Vienna on 11 and 12 December 1998 invited the Commission to consider the possibility of drawing up a legal instrument on the law applicable to divorce. In November 2004, the European Council invited the Commission to present a Green Paper on conflict-of-law rules in divorce matters.

(4) In line with its political mandate, the Commission presented a Green Paper on applicable law and jurisdiction in divorce matters on 14 March 2005. The Green Paper launched a wide public consultation on possible solutions to the problems that may arise under the current situation.

(5) This Regulation should provide a clear and comprehensive legal framework in matrimonial matters in the European Union and ensure adequate solutions to the citizens in terms of legal certainty, predictability, flexibility and access to court.

(6) With the aim of enhancing legal certainty, predictability and flexibility, this Regulation should introduce the possibility for spouses to agree upon the competent court in proceedings for divorce and legal separation. It also should give the parties a certain possibility to choose the law applicable to divorce and legal separation. Such possibility should not extend to marriage annulment, which is closely linked to the conditions for the validity of the marriage, and for which parties' autonomy is inappropriate.

(7) In the absence of choice of applicable law, this Regulation should introduce harmonised conflict-of-law rules based on a scale of connecting factors to ensure legal certainty and predictability and to prevent "rush to court". Such connecting factors should be chosen as to ensure that proceedings relating to divorce or legal separation be governed by a law with which the marriage has a close connection.

(8) Considerations of public interest should justify the possibility in exceptional circumstances to disregard the application of the foreign law in a given case where this would be manifestly contrary to the public policy of the forum.

(9) The residual rule on jurisdiction should be revised to enhance predictability and access to courts for spouses of different nationalities living in a third State. To this end, the Regulation should set out a harmonised rule on residual jurisdiction to enable couples of different nationalities to seise a court of a Member State with which they have a close connection by virtue of their nationality or their last common habitual residence.

(10) Article 12 of Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 should be amended to ensure that a divorce court designated pursuant to Article 3a has jurisdiction also in matters of parental responsibility connected with the divorce application provided the conditions set out in Article 12 of the same Regulation are met, in particular that the jurisdiction is in the best interests of the child.

(11) Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003 should therefore be amended accordingly.

(12) Since the objectives of the action to be taken, namely to enhance legal certainty, flexibility and access to court in international matrimonial proceedings, cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States and can therefore, by reason of scale, be better achieved at Community level, the Community may adopt measures, in accordance with the principles of subsidiarity as set out in Article 5 of the Treaty. In accordance with the principle of proportionality, as set out in that Article, this Regulation does not go beyond what is necessary to attain these objectives.

(13) This Regulation respects the fundamental rights and observes the principles recognised in particular by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union as general principles of Community law. In particular, it seeks to ensure full respect for the right to a fair trial as recognised in Article 47 of the Charter.

(14) [The United Kingdom and Ireland, in accordance with Article 3 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, have given notice of their wish to take part in the adoption and application of this Regulation.]

(15) Denmark, in accordance with Articles 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark annexed to the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty establishing the European Community, is not participating in the adoption of this Regulation, and is therefore not bound by it nor subject to its application.

HAS ADOPTED THIS REGULATION:

IMPACT ASSESSMENT {COM(2006) 399 final}{SEC(2006) 950}

TABLE OF CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION

There are currently no Community provisions on applicable law in matrimonial matters. Council Regulation (EC) No. 1347/2000[1] (the Brussels II Regulation) includes rules on jurisdiction and recognition in matrimonial matters, but does not comprise rules on applicable law. The entry into application of Council Regulation (EC) No. 2201/2003[2] (the new Brussels II Regulation), which replaces the Brussels II Regulation as of 1 March 2005, does not entail any change in this respect, since it takes over the rules on matrimonial matters from the Brussels II Regulation practically unchanged.

There is currently no multilateral convention in force between the Member States on the question of applicable law to divorces.[3]

The European Council in Vienna emphasised in 1998 that the aim of a common judicial area is to make life simpler for the citizens, in particular in cases affecting the everyday life of the citizens, such as divorce.[4] In November 2004, the European Council invited the Commission to present a Green Paper on the conflict-of-law rules in matters relating to divorce in 2005.[5]

The increasing mobility of citizens within the European Union has resulted in an increasing number of international marriages where the spouses are of different nationalities, or live in different Member States or live in a Member State of which they are not nationals. In the event that an international couple decide to divorce, several laws may be invoked. The aim of the rules on applicable law, often referred to as conflict-of-law rules, is to determine which of the different laws that will apply. In view of the high number of divorces within the European Union, applicable law and international jurisdiction in divorce matters affect a considerable number of citizens (see section 3 and Annexes 3-5).

This Impact Assessment has been made on the basis of a study prepared for the Commission by an external contractor. [6]

The term "divorce" is used in this report for the sake of simplicity to encompass all matrimonial proceedings, including legal separation and marriage annulment.

PROBLEMS DUE TO THE CURRENT STATE OF PLAY

The following sub-sections provide more in-depth descriptions of the problems that international couples' may encounter when they want to dissolve their marriage:

Difficulties for the spouses to predict which law that will apply in matrimonial proceedings

All Member States with the exception of Malta allow divorce.[7] Significant differences exist between the Member States' divorce laws, concerning the grounds for divorce as well as the procedures. This divergence can be explained by different factors, such as the different family policies and cultural values. Annex 1 provides an overview of the Member States' rules on the grounds for divorce.

The public consultation[8] revealed that it is currently difficult for spouses and practitioners to predict what law will apply as a result of the differences of the national conflict-of-law rules. Due to the differences between the substantive laws, the conditions for divorce may change drastically depending on which law that applies, in terms of time, requirements of proof of separation periods, grounds for divorce etc. It may also have significant implications for ancillary matters, such as the division of property and maintenance obligations. Citizens are unlikely to be aware of the different legal systems and that the requirements and conditions for divorcing may change substantially as a result of a move. They may thereby find themselves subject to a divorce law with which they do not feel closely connected.

There are significant differences between the Member States' conflict-of-law rules concerning divorce. One category of States determine the applicable law on the basis of a scale of connecting factors that seek to ensure that the divorce is governed by the legal order with which it has the closest connection. The connecting factors vary, but include in most cases criteria based on the nationality or habitual residence of the spouses. The majority of Member States belong to this category. The second category of States applies systematically their domestic laws (lex fori) to divorce proceedings. Annex 2 provides an overview of the national conflict-of-law rules of the Member States.

Insufficient flexibility and party autonomy for citizens to choose competent court and applicable law

In principle, national conflict-of-law rules only foresee one solution in a given situation, e.g. the application of the law of the spouses' common nationality or the law of the forum and do not take account of the wishes of the spouses. Three Member States (Belgium, the Netherlands and Germany) currently offer the spouses a limited possibility to choose the applicable law. This lack of flexibility may lead to a number of problems.

It fails for example to take into account that citizens may feel closely connected with a Member State where they have lived for a long time although they are not nationals of that State. National rules which determine the applicable law on the basis of the common nationality of the spouses do not take into consideration those cases where spouses live in and are fully integrated in a another Member State and would prefer the law of that State to apply. On the other hand, individuals may in some cases live in another country than their country of origin for a number of years and still feel more closely connected with the law of their nationality.

The systematic application of the law of the forum can lead to the application of a law with which the spouses are only tenuously connected, e.g. if they have recently moved there. As a result, citizens are not always able to divorce according to the law of the Member State with which they feel the closest connection. This may lead to results that do not correspond to the legitimate expectations' of the citizens.

There is currently no possibility under Community law for the spouses to designate a competent court by common agreement ("prorogation"). Whereas the new Brussels II Regulation provides this possibility in matters of parental responsibility, it is not foreseen in matrimonial matters.

Risk of "rush to court" by one spouse

Article 3 of the new Brussels II Regulation includes seven grounds of jurisdiction in divorce matters. The grounds are alternative and do not take precedence over each other. If two spouses bring divorce proceedings before courts of different Member States, the "lis pendens" rule (Article 19) provides that the competent court that is seised first will have jurisdiction. As a result, courts of other Member States must dismiss any subsequent application. This mechanism ensures legal certainty, avoids duplication of litigation, parallel actions and the possibility of irreconcilable judgments.

The combination of the rules in Article 3 and Article 19 may however induce a spouse to apply for divorce before the other spouse has done so to prevent the courts of another Member State from acquiring jurisdiction in order to ensure the application of a certain law which is favourable to him or her (so-called rush to court'). The reason for this may be to obtain the divorce quicker than would otherwise be possible. The financial provisions ancillary to divorce often play an important role, e.g. with regard to maintenance and division of property.

This can in turn lead to the application of a law with which the defendant does not feel closely connected or which does not take his/her interests into account. This may bring along a number of negative consequences, in particular for vulnerable spouses', e.g. those who cannot afford lawyers who investigate where it is most beneficial to get divorced. "Rush to court" also renders reconciliation difficult because there is no time for mediation efforts. The high frequency and seriousness of the rush-to-court problem were emphasised by many practitioners during the consultation process.

Risk of difficulties for couples of different nationalities living outside the EU

The jurisdiction rules (Articles 3-5) of the new Brussels II Regulation do not apply to couples of different nationalities living in a third State. Such couples may encounter problems. In these situations, Article 7 of the new Brussels II Regulation provides that the courts of the Member States may avail themselves of the national rules of jurisdiction (so-called "residual jurisdiction"). However, the national rules of jurisdiction are not harmonised but based on different criteria, such as nationality, residence or domicile. Two Member States (Belgium and the Netherlands) do not have any national rules on residual jurisdiction. The fact that national rules are based on different criteria may leads to legal uncertainty. It may also lead to situations where no court within the European Union or elsewhere is competent. Such a situation deprives the parties of their right of access to a court. In addition, a decision issued by a court in a third State is not recognised in a Member State pursuant to Council Regulation (EC) No 2201/2003, whose rules on recognition apply only to decisions issued by a court in a Member State. The spouses could therefore face problems to have the ensuing decision recognised in their respective home States.

THE SIZE OF THE PROBLEM

This section provides an overview of the numbers of international divorces and marriages in the EU based on data from the Member States' statistical offices. The number of people that may, potentially, be affected by any proposed changes to international divorce legislation is examined by presenting statistical data for "international divorces". Where such statistics are not available, figures on "international marriages" have been incorporated as an indication of the numbers of those likely to be affected by legislation relating to international divorce.

An overview of statistics available on international marriages and divorces is found in Annex 3.

The available data on "international divorces" include divorces between a national of the Member State concerned and:

(a) a citizen of another EU Member State;

(b) a citizen of a non EU State;

(c) a citizen of double nationality

(d) a non-national of unknown origin (including both EU citizens and non-EU citizens)

It includes also divorces between two non-nationals who divorce in the Member State concerned (of the same or of different nationality).

Annex 4 provides the number of international divorce cases by Member State 2000-2004.

International divorces

Data relating to international divorces have been analysed for 13 Member States. Of the 13, only 8 Member States (Germany, Estonia, Finland, Hungary, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden) were able to present complete information for 4 years (2000-2003) with a clear breakdown of the nationality of the spouses. A further 5 Member States (Belgium, Czech Republic, Cyprus, Italy, and Slovenia) have provided data for 1 or 2 years.

The information provided by the national statistical office for Austria shows the number of Austrian nationals respectively the number of non-Austrian nationals divorcing each year in Austria. However, it is not possible to establish the number of international divorces, since the data do not specify the nationality of the spouses. Polish data[9] confirm the number of individuals living in Poland divorcing each year, but do not record the nationality of the spouses. It is therefore impossible to ascertain the nationality of individuals seeking divorce and the data were not included in the analysis.

The statistics offices and government departments in the remaining 8 Member States (Spain, France, Greece, Ireland, Slovak Republic, Latvia, Lithuania and the United Kingdom) have confirmed that they do not hold information regarding the nationality of spouses getting divorced.

There are no data concerning Malta and Denmark. In Malta divorce is not permitted. Efforts were made to obtain data on international' legal separations and marriage annulments issued in Malta, but the Maltese statistical office has confirmed that no such data are collected. Data have not been collected for Denmark, since any proposed Community action would not apply there. [10]

The rate of international divorces of the total number of divorces has increased for all countries except Portugal and Estonia for the period 2000-2004. The rate of international divorces is highest in Estonia (ca 50%) and lowest in Hungary (ca 1,5%). Germany has recorded the highest number of international divorces (36,933 in 2004) compared with Slovenia, which reports the lowest number (256 in 2004).

Table 3.1. gives an overview of the number of international divorces in the Member States.

The proportion of international divorces including foreigners only, has generally increased in all Member States in the period 2000 to 2003. The exceptions to this are Hungary and Portugal. The rate is highest in Estonia (78% in 2002 and 2003) and lowest in the Czech Republic (3.59% in 2003) and Hungary (3.54% in 2001). In Luxembourg, half of the international divorce cases involve foreigners only, but also in the Netherlands and Sweden this type of divorce reaches almost 50% (around 45% of total international cases). The proportions for Belgium, Germany, Finland and Portugal are around 25%.

International marriages

Data on international marriages has been accessed for 17 countries. Of these, 9 countries (Germany, Estonia, France, Hungary, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Sweden) presented comprehensive data for 2000-2003. Two countries (Belgium and Finland) provided figures for 3 years, whilst 6 Member States (Austria, Czech Republic, Cyprus, Spain, Latvia, and Portugal) only had figures for 1 year.

Latvian statistical data could not be utilised since only details on spouses' ethnicity and not nationality were provided. Maltese statistics report the number of men and women who get married in Malta each year but do not record the nationality of the partner. Slovenian data do not show figures for marriages by nationality but for husband-wife families by ethnic affiliation in 2002.

The remaining 4 countries (Greece, Ireland, Lithuania and United Kingdom) were not able to provide any information on marriages with a breakdown by nationality.

Annex 4 provides the number of international marriages by Member State for the years 2000-2004.

The figures show an increase in the rate of international marriages in some countries[11] during the years 2000-2003. In France the rate increased from 7.1 to 9.4 per 10,000 population and in Luxembourg it also slightly increased (from 26.3 to 26.8). However, in the Netherlands and Germany, the rate decreased in 2003 compared with 2002 (in the Netherlands from 13.5 to 12.2, and in Germany from 9 to 8.6). The highest rate of international marriages on total numbers of marriages has been recorded in Estonia. Hungary has the lowest rate. In terms of the number of international marriages, Germany has recorded the highest number of international marriages (73,719 in 2002) whilst Luxembourg recorded the lowest in the same period (1,100 in 2002).

Numbers of international marriages and divorce cases by 10,000 persons

Using the data on international divorces and marriages provided by the Member States and the total population living in each county, a weighted average has been calculated for international marriages and divorces for 2003.[12] These rates, which represent the number of international divorce and marriage cases per 10,000 persons, are provided in Table 3.2. below.

Table 3.2. - Weighted average for international marriages and divorce cases in relation to 10,000 persons

The data show that in 2003 there were, on average, almost 8 international marriages per 10,000 persons.[13] This can be compared with the numbers of national marriages (39 per 10,000 persons) identifying that on average every fifth marriage relates to an international couple. Based on these calculations it is possible to make an estimation of the total number of international marriages in the EU. This would be 350,299 cases if the remaining Member States have the same rate of international marriages as those indicated by the data used for the analysis.

International data regarding divorces[14] identified that there were almost 4 international divorce cases per 10,000 persons. The numbers of national divorce cases were around 22 per 10,000 persons. Based on this estimate, the total number of international divorce cases in the EU Member States would be 172,230 cases per year.

Given that the rates of international marriages and divorces do not vary enormously amongst the larger EU countries, it is generally safe to assume that the bulk of the incidences of divorces involving international couples will take place in or involve spouses living in these countries.

Conclusion:

The incidences of international marriages and divorces appear to be generally stable with evidence of minor increases. Very often international marriages involve third country nationals. All EU countries have significant numbers of international marriages, the larger EU countries in populations terms account for a high proportion of international marriages and divorces.

Based on the available data, there are in the order of 2.2 million marriages in the EU per year. It is estimated that in the order of 350,000 of these marriages are international.

There are around 875,000 divorces in the EU per year (excluding Denmark). It is estimated that around 170,000, or 16% of these divorces are of international character.

MAIN OBJECTIVES OF THE PROPOSAL

The overall objective of the Proposal is to provide a clear and comprehensive legal framework in matrimonial matters in the European Union and ensure adequate solutions to the citizens in terms of legal certainty, predictability, flexibility and access to court. The objectives described below correspond to the problems identified under section 2. The proposed rules should meet the following objectives:

(a) enhance legal certainty and predictability;

(b) increase flexibility and party autonomy;

(c) prevent rush to court' by one spouse; and

(d) ensure access to court.

POLICY OPTIONS

Option 1: Status quo

This policy option assumes that no new policy initiatives would take place at EU level. In assessing this policy option consideration will be given to whether existing activities and trends will affect the nature and severity of the problems identified.

The new Brussels II Regulation, which entered into application on 1st March 2005, harmonises the rules the competent court and mutual recognition of divorce judgments. However, it does not harmonise the rules on applicable law.

Option 2: Increased co-operation between Member States

Policy option 2 is a non-legislative action whereby the EU would provide some financial support to encourage relevant co-operation activities between Member States. The following activities could benefit from EU support:

Support to exchanging best practice on family courts. At the moment, some Member States (e.g. Germany and Austria) have special family courts that deal exclusively with family law cases, including international divorces. Feedback from such courts indicates that such specialisation is useful and leads to efficiencies. The EU could financially support Member States learning about specialist family courts from each other and encourage the establishment of such courts across the EU.

Networks of expertise on different national divorce laws. A network of liaison judges and / or lawyers could be set up to provide effective assistance and expert advice on matters relating to their respective national laws. The web-site of the European Judicial Network in civil and commercial matters, which already provides information on the divorce laws of the different Member States, could be expanded [15] (see below point 8.2). In addition, co-operation and exchange of information could be supported by specialised national institutes such as Max Planck Institute in Germany or the International Legal Institute in the Netherlands.

Information campaign. An information campaign could be organised to inform EU citizens of the differences between the Member States' laws on divorce and of the practical consequences of a move to another Member State in terms of a possible future divorce proceeding.

On the basis of financing of similar EU initiatives, it could be envisaged that the EU could devote around 5 million Euro per year to supporting of such co-operation activities between the Member States.

Option 3: Harmonising conflict-of-law rules and introducing a limited possibility for the spouses to choose applicable law

This policy option would involve legislative action at Community level through harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules. The aim of this rule would be to ensure that the divorce is governed by the law with which the marriage has the closest connection. It could be based on the first place on the limited choice of the parties. In the absence of choice, the applicable law could be determined on the basis of a set of connecting factors, based on the last common habitual residence of the spouses, the common nationality or the law of the forum.

Certain formal requirements would be added to ensure that the spouses are aware of the consequences of their choice and to prevent abuse. This policy option would be supported by a public policy clause, which would allow the courts to refrain from applying a foreign law if it would be manifestly contrary to the public policy and fundamental values of that Member State.

Option 4: Revising the rules on jurisdiction in Article 3 of Council Regulation (EC) 2201/2003

This policy option involves legislative action at the Community level in terms of revision of the jurisdiction rules of the new Brussels II Regulation. The grounds of jurisdiction listed in Article 3 of the new Brussels II Regulation were originally designed to meet objective requirements, to be in line with the interests of the parties, involve flexible rules to deal with mobility and to meet individuals' needs without sacrificing legal certainty.[16]

It could be argued that the jurisdiction rules do not entirely meet these objectives. In the absence of uniform conflict-of-law rules, the existence of several alternative grounds of jurisdiction may lead to the application of laws with which the spouses are not necessarily the most closely connected. On the other hand, the grounds of jurisdiction may in certain cases not be sufficiently flexible to meet individuals' needs.

The consequences of any revision would need to be carefully considered. Hence, a restriction of the grounds of jurisdiction may have adverse consequences in terms of flexibility and access to courts, unless the parties are given the opportunity to choose the competent court. On the other hand, adding new grounds of jurisdiction may further exacerbate the lack of legal certainty. A third possibility would be to replace the list of alternative grounds of jurisdiction by a rule in which the grounds of jurisdiction are listed in hierarchical order.

Policy Option 5: Giving the spouses a limited possibility to choose the competent court ("prorogation")

This policy option would allow the spouses to choose the competent court by common agreement. This would not only promote agreement between spouses and enhance predictability, but it would also improve access to court for couples of different nationalities. The choice should be limited to certain jurisdictions with which the spouses have a close link by virtue of habitual residence or nationality. Alternative connecting factors such as last common habitual residence and nationality of one of the spouses would be specified in the legislation. As for policy option 3, formal requirements should be included to ensure that the spouses are aware of the consequences of their choice.

Option 6: Revising the rule on residual jurisdiction in Article 7 of Council Regulation (EC) 2201/2003

This policy option involves legislative action at Community level in the form of adopting common rules on residual jurisdiction to ensure that citizens living in a country outside the Union could initiate divorce proceedings before a court in a Member State of which they are nationals or in which they have lived for a certain period of time. In its current wording, Article 7 of the new Brussels II Regulation does not effectively ensure access to court for couples of different nationalities living in a third State. Article 7 refers to the national rules on residual jurisdiction which differ significantly and may lead to situation where a couple of different nationalities living in a third State cannot apply for divorce in a Member State or elsewhere.

ASSESSMENT OF THE POLICY OPTIONS

This section provides an assessment of each of the identified policy options described in Section 5. Each policy option is assessed to determine to which extent it solves the problems identified in Section 2 and meets of the policy objectives described in Section 4 (see also table 6.1). The constraints and problems associated with each problem are mentioned as well as the impact on fundamental rights.

With regard to the financial and organisation resources required for the implementation of each policy option, it is generally very difficult to estimate the exact costs and administrative burden of the proposed policy options, with the exception of policy option 2. Any legislative change would obviously entail certain costs for the training on the new legislation.

Benefits and disadvantages of Policy Option 1 (Status quo)

The benefits of maintaining the Status quo' are that no additional financial commitment or legislative or system changes would be required. However, Policy Option 1 will not address the policy objectives because actions of individual Member States will not improve the situation for international couples who want to divorce. Problems such as difficulties for spouses to predict what law will be applied and rush to court will not be reduced. The latter problem is not likely to diminish without harmonisation of rules (or substantive laws) in relation to divorce and ancillary matters. There are currently no evident trends towards convergence of Member States' substantive divorce laws. The problems related to legal certainty and access to court for citizens outside the EU are likely to remain. Negative consequences for the spouses in terms of distress, time taken, high costs and rights of the weaker spouse are likely to remain unchanged. Fundamental rights would not be furthered by this option. Current trends, which indicate that EU citizens are increasingly taking advantage of the free movement, mean that there is a likelihood of an increased number of international marriages and international divorces in the future. This means that more EU citizens will be subject to the problems described above.

Benefits and disadvantages of Policy Option 2 (Increased co-operation between Member States)

Policy Option 2 would not require any legislative changes at EU or national level, but some financial support from the EU to Member States for cooperation activities. The option would be largely focussed on improving the current situation rather than changing it. As such, it would not solve any of the fundamental sources of the problems and will only address some of the problems to some degree. It would therefore not go far towards addressing the policy objectives. Depending on what actions would be adopted, positive impacts include that it would lead to higher effectiveness in cases where foreign law is applied, which would lead to decreased costs, shorter divorce processes and decreased numbers of cases where foreign law is applied incorrectly. Informing EU citizens about the problems would result in higher awareness and preparedness for the results of a move to another EU Member States, but it could have negative impacts on the trust in the EU citizenship and common judicial area, and decrease incentives for moving within the EU.

On the basis of similar activities at EU level, the estimated cost of this Policy Option would be approximately 5 million per year.

Benefits and disadvantages of Policy Option 3 (Harmonising conflict-of-law rules and introducing a limited possibility for the spouses to choose applicable law)

This option would lead to a number of improvements compared to the current situation. It would to a high extent increase legal certainty, party autonomy and flexibility. It would also reduce the risk of rush to court, which has been identified by several stakeholders as the most severe current problem. In those cases when spouses cannot agree on applicable law, it will be automatically' determined through the harmonised conflict-of-law rules. The connecting factors are selected to ensure that the divorce is governed by a law with which the spouses have a close connection.

The possibility to choose applicable law would be particularly useful in cases of divorce by mutual consent. Data for four countries (Italy, Luxembourg, Austria and Poland) show that between 70 and 90% of the divorces are made with mutual consent.

The main drawbacks of the policy option are that it would entail the application of foreign courts by the courts in certain cases. Certain practitioners consider this to be a practical problem which could lead to lengthier divorce processes and thereby additional costs for spouses. Who will bear the main costs for finding out the content of foreign law depends on whether the spouses are required to provide the judge with this information or if this is done by the judge ex officio'. Moreover, there is a certain risk that the foreign law is incorrectly applied. Several stakeholders consulted had direct experience of this. The adoption of measures to facilitate application of foreign law should reduce the negative consequences in terms of delays, increased costs, and risks that the foreign law is wrongly applied. In terms of impacts on legal professions, the option would lead to increased efficiency as the harmonised conflict-of-law rules would simplify the legal assessment. It could also lead to new work opportunities because of formal requirements for spouses who agree on law. Training on the new legislation would be needed.

The problems relating to the application of foreign law should be scarce in practice, since the connecting factors would lead to the application of the law of the forum in the large majority of cases. The habitual residence of the spouses is chosen as the first connecting factor followed by the last habitual residence of the spouses if one of them still resides there.

The impact on fundamental rights would be positive. The principle of non-discrimination would be fully respected insofar as the harmonised rules would be of universal application, meaning that they could designate the law of a Member State or the law of a third State. The same rules would apply to all EU citizens, regardless of nationality. The right to a fair trial would be respected would also be respected since this Policy Option would enhance legal certainty and reduce risk of rush to court.

This Policy Option would entail an important change of the national legal systems, in particular in the Member States that currently only apply lex fori. It would imply some costs on Member States' administrative and legal systems for training purposes. The costs are likely to be higher in the Member States that currently only apply lex fori than for the Member States whose legal systems are based on connecting factors which may lead to the application of foreign law. It would also entail some costs at EU and/or at national level to facilitate the application of foreign law. This could include the setting up of national institutes or specialised courts. The costs can be assessed on the basis of existing institutes and courts, e.g. in Germany, the Netherlands and Germany. There could also be support at EU level (see policy option 2). It would also imply some costs on Member States' administrative and legal systems for training purposes.

Benefits and disadvantages of Policy Option 4 (Revising the rules on jurisdiction in Article 3 of Council Regulation (EC) 2201/2003)

This Policy Option would only address spouses' problems to a minor extent. One could envisage three possible means to revise the current jurisdiction rule as set out in Article 3: (a) to extend the number of grounds of jurisdiction (b) to decrease the number of grounds of jurisdiction or (c) to introduce a hierarchy between the grounds of jurisdiction. Each of the sub-options implies a trade-off between legal certainty and flexibility. Moreover, none of the sub-options would give EU citizens in international marriages living outside the EU access to court or increase party autonomy. Two of the sub-options (decreasing the grounds of jurisdiction and introducing a hierarchy between the jurisdiction grounds) would even decrease flexibility and access to court. On the other hand, both of these sub-options would reduce the risk of rush to court' and also increase efficiency for legal professions as there would be fewer grounds for jurisdiction (which would simplify the legal assessment). To extend the grounds would, on the other hand, decrease legal certainty, but at the same time increase access to court and flexibility. All sub-options would result in increasing training needs for legal professions on the new legislation. However, none of the sub-options would lead to any major changes to the national legal systems or costs. Even though the sub-option does not imply any major changes to Member States' current legal systems, most Member States are firmly against re-opening the discussions on the grounds of jurisdiction.

It would not have any impact on fundamental rights, since the same rules would apply independently of gender and nationality.

Since this Policy Option would not result in any major change of the national legal systems, it would not entail any major costs on Member States' legal and administrative systems.

Benefits and disadvantages of Policy Option 5 (Giving the spouses a limited possibility to choose the competent court ("prorogation"))

The introduction of a limited possibility for the spouses to choose the competent court (prorogation')', would have a positive impact on the spouses with regard to most of the policy objectives, although it would obviously be limited to those spouses who can agree on competent court. It would be possible to introduce this Policy Option separately and not harmonise the conflict-of-law rules. This would allow the spouses a limited choice of jurisdiction whilst allowing Member States to keep their national conflict of law rules.

For legal professions, giving spouses a limited possibility to choose competent court would lead to increased efficiency and could also lead to creation of new work opportunities due to formal requirements for establishing the agreement. Training on the new legislation and the formal requirements would be necessary. The option would obviously only lead to benefits for spouses who can agree on law. Member States are in general supportive to giving the spouses a limited choice of court and / or applicable law.

It would have a positive impact on fundamental rights, since it would enhance access to court and legal certainty for couples who make use of the possibility to choose competent court.

This Policy Option would not result in any major change of the national legal systems and would therefore not entail any major costs on Member States' legal and administrative systems.

Benefits and disadvantages of Policy Option 6 (Revising the rule on residual jurisdiction in Article 7 of Council Regulation (EC) 2201/2003)

Policy Option 6 addresses a separate problem. In some cases, citizens of different nationalities living outside the EU may currently not apply for divorce either in the country they are living in or in the EU (on the basis of their nationality). This option therefore addresses a fundamental right of access to court. Positive impacts are mainly evident in terms of achieving the specific objective of access to court. It would also increase legal certainty for couples of different nationalities living outside the EU who have a strong connection with a Member State, because of nationality or because they have previously resided there for a period of time. This may present practical advantages in particular for spouses who want to move back to their country of origin and/or need to have their divorce recognised in that country. Member States are in general open to the idea of adopting a common rule on residual jurisdiction', including those Member States that currently have rules that give their nationals access to court.

It would have a positive impact on fundamental rights, since it would enhance access to court and legal certainty for couples of different nationality living in third States. It would ensure access to court not only to EU nationals, but also to nationals of third States who have had their common habitual residence in a Member State for at least three years.

Table 6.1.- Comparison of policy options |

Objective to be achieved/ problem addressed | Anticipated impact effectiveness (rated from * to ) | Explanation of rating and aspects of the policy option necessary to achieve impact |

To increase legal certainty concerning applicable law |  | Harmonised conflict of law rules will ensure legal certainty as far as possible in the current situation where substantive laws differ between Member States. Not only will there be clarity in terms of having a common system throughout the EU, but also, having common habitual residence as first connecting factor, will result in that lex fori probably will be applied in a majority of cases. This means that the problems related to application of foreign law will be scarce. Introducing a possibility to choose applicable law or competent court will also increase legal certainty. |

To increase party autonomy for citizens to choose applicable law / competent court | * | Party autonomy will be greatly increased for those couples who are able to agree on competent court and applicable law. |

To increase flexibility in terms of access to courts in Member States for citizens living in the EU | * | Flexibility will be greatly increased for those couples who are able to agree on competent court. For other spouses, the harmonised conflict-of-law rule will only provide for one solution in each given case. |

To reduce risk of rush to court' | () | Rush to court would be effectively prevented by the adoption of this policy option. If the spouses cannot agree on competent court or law, jurisdiction and applicable law will be automatically' determined through the harmonised conflict of law rules. |

To ensure access to court for citizens living in third States |  | Access to court could be ensured by a revision to Article 7 of the New Brussels II Regulation to allow spouses to get divorced in a Member State with which they are closely connected. Furthermore, the proposed rule on prorogation would apply also to spouses living in third States and enhance access to court in cases the spouses can come to an agreement on the competent court. |

Impacts on fundamental rights |

Equality before the law (between men and women) |  | The rules will apply independently of gender. |

Non-discrimination of EU nationals |  | The same rules will apply independently of nationality.

Non-discrimination of third State nationals living in the EU |  | The rules will apply to EU nationals and non-EU nationals having previously lived in the EU. |

Right to effective remedy (fair trial); reasonable time |  | The combination of giving the spouses a limited choice of competent, harmonised conflict of law rules and a hierarchy of competent court would greatly increase efficiency of determining competent court and applicable law. |

Benefits and advantages of options | There are clear benefits of this policy option, since it addresses the problems and achieves the objectives to a higher extent than any of the other options. Only a policy option including changes to substantive laws (which is not within the Community competences) would be able to achieve a higher rating. |

Disadvantages of policy option | The adoption of the policy option is dependent on what rules the Member States can agree on e.g. the content of harmonisation of conflict of law rules and competent court. |

Issues raised in Green Paper, additional stakeholder and Public Hearing consultations | The vast majority of stakeholders are in favour of introducing a limited choice of court and applicable law for spouses. Many stakeholders are also in favour of harmonising conflict of law rules. A high number of stakeholders have commented on problems relating to the application of foreign law and emphasised the importance of adopting supporting measures to facilitate such application e.g. finding out content of the law. Many stakeholders are open to the idea of adopting common rules on residual jurisdiction. |

Political acceptability | The vast majority of Member States are in favour of introducing a limited choice of court and applicable law for spouses. The majority of Member States are also in favour of harmonising conflict of law. In general, there seems to be support for providing the spouses with a choice of court and applicable law as well as adopting common jurisdiction rules. |

Administrative costs | This Policy Option would entail the harmonisation of conflict-of-law rules, which would be an important change of the national legal systems, in particular in the Member States that currently only apply lex fori. It would imply some costs on Member States' administrative and legal systems for training purposes. The costs are likely to be higher in the Member States that currently only apply lex fori than for the Member States whose legal systems are based on connecting factors which may lead to the application of foreign law. It would also entail some costs at EU and/or at national level to facilitate the application of foreign law. This could include the setting up of national institutes or specialised courts. The costs can be assessed on the basis of existing institutes and courts, e.g. in Germany, the Netherlands and Germany. There could also be support at EU level (see policy option 2). It would also imply some costs on Member States' administrative and legal systems for training purposes. |

- SUBSIDIARITY AND PROPORTIONALITY

The subsidiarity principle ensures that within the EU intervention is taken at the most appropriate level to achieve the policy objectives and address the problems in the current situation. The proportionality principle provides that measures taken are proportionate to the size and extent of the problems.

The legal basis for Community action in the divorce area is established in Articles 61(c) and 65 of the Treaty establishing the European Community. These provisions state that in order to establish a common judicial area, the Community is to adopt measures in the field of judicial cooperation in civil matters in so far as necessary for the proper functioning of the internal market'. Furthermore, the principle of proportionality, as set out in Article 5 of the Treaty establishing the European Community, provides that common action shall not go beyond what is necessary to achieve the objectives.

National substantive rules are not affected by the proposed Community action, which is limited to the rules on international jurisdiction and applicable law. The proposal is limited to "international" divorces. There are currently no indications of convergence of either national conflict-of-law rules in this area. There are no international instruments in this field which the Member States could ratify. The problems including rush to court', insufficient legal certainty and party autonomy, would remain.

The fact that the courts of the Member States would apply the same conflict rules to determine the law applicable to a given situation would increase legal certainty and thereby reinforce the principle of mutual recognition and trust in judicial decisions given in other Member States and the free movement of citizens. For individuals to be able to fully exercise their rights wherever they might be in the Union, the EU has acknowledged that the incompatibilities between judicial and administrative systems between Member States have to be removed. It is clear that without Community action in the area of divorce matters, the problems identified would not be resolved and the policy objective of a common judicial area that make life for the EU citizens easier would not be achieved. Common action therefore respects the principle of subsidiarity articulated in the Article 2 of the Treaty on European Union and Article 5 of the Treaty establishing the European Community.

There are a large and growing number of EU citizens that are affected directly and indirectly by international divorces. Divorce amongst those of the same nationality is traumatic and can be costly. The situation is likely to be worse for international divorcees because of the problems described in section 2 of this report. The costs of the proposed reforms are modest and the benefits are, in comparison, very large. It would strengthen legal certainty, increase flexibility, ensure access to court and prevent rush to the court whilst Member States retain full sovereignty with regard to the substantive laws on divorce.

The problems that the preferred policy option would address stem from the cross-border nature of the divorces involved. According to available data, the estimated number of international divorces in the EU is around 170,000 cases per year or 16% of all divorces. Feedback from practitioners suggest that a significant proportion of these divorcing couples experience a number of practical problems arising from the current rules governing international marriage and divorce. No Member State acting alone would be able to address and solve the problems identified in the current situation. By contrast, the preferred policy option, based on legislative intervention by the EU, would address the problems arising in cross-border divorces.

In addition, the lack of EU action in this area would significantly damage the legitimate interests of EU citizens, who have certain expectations of the functioning of the internal market and an effective common judicial area. In the current situation, international couples face considerable legal uncertainty with regard to the applicable law. The lack of harmonised rules may lead to distress and high cost in international divorce proceedings. The preferred policy option of EU legislative action would be able to address such problems.

The preferred policy option would also meet the EU obligation to safeguard and ensure the protection of citizens' fundamental rights. In particular, it would ensure that the international spouses are not discriminated because of their nationality, that an effective remedy to their situation takes reasonable time and everybody is equal before the law. Finally, it would ensure access to court to citizens living in third States.

MONITORING AND EVALUATION

Monitoring and evaluation of the preferred policy option are important elements to ensure its efficiency and effectiveness in addressing the problems and meeting policy objectives. Table 11.1 below suggests several indicators to evaluate the progress made by the preferred option towards achieving each of the objectives set for such a legislative instrument.

Evaluation would require regular follow-up surveys of divorcing couples and legal practitioners, as well as collection of information from judicial records from the Member States. A proper, regular and systematic assessment of effectiveness and efficiency of the preferred policy option would have cost implications, which might require support, in terms of financial and human resources, from the European Commission.

Overview of available statistics in the Member States on international marriages and divorces

Annex 4

NUMBER OF INTERNATIONAL DIVORCES IN MEMBER STATES IN WHICH STATISTICS ARE AVAILABLE

By means of summary (listing the countries by rate of international divorces, starting with the highest):

Estonia: This country had the highest rate of international divorces compared with the total number of divorces across the countries for which data were available (52.2% in 2001; 2,251 cases). The divorce rate peaked in 2001 and since then there has been a slight decrease in international divorces (49.64% in 2003; 1,972 cases). A significant proportion of these divorces (around 78%) involve foreigners only (i.e. no Estonian national involved).

Cyprus: Data were only accessed for one year, 2004. In this year the number of international divorce cases was 594 (37%). Of these cases, 14% involved a Cyprian national with another EU citizen whilst 51% included a Cyprian and a non-EU national. 20% of the divorces included foreigners only.

Netherlands: The international divorce rate increased from 2000 to 2004. The number of international divorces, however, decreased from 9,151 cases in 2000 to 9,134 in 2004. The total number of international divorces reached its peak in 2001 with 9,770 divorces (26% of total divorces).

Sweden: The rate and number of international divorces have increased steadily in the period 2000 (4,575 cases, 21.28% of total divorces) to 2003 (4,725 cases, 22.36%). Whilst the number of international divorces increased in this period, the number of national divorces decreased (from 16,927 in 2000 to 16,405 in 2004).

Germany: The proportion of international divorces increased on a yearly basis from 15% in 2000 to 17% in 2004 (of total divorces). The number of international divorces has increased from 28,475 cases in 2000 to 36,933 in 2004.

Belgium: The number of international divorces in 2002 was 4,461, representing 15% of the total number of divorces this year. Most of these international divorces concerned couples of the type Belgian-foreigner (78%) whereas 22% involved two foreigners. Data were accessed for one year only.

Finland: The proportion of international divorces of the total number of divorces increased in the period 2000-2003; from 11% (1,556 cases) in 2000 to 14% (1,880) in 2003. During the same period the number of national divorces decreased, from 12,357 in 2000 to 11,595 in 2003. About 75% of the cases relate to Finnish-foreigner couples while 25% relate to divorces between foreigners only.

Slovak Republic: No numbers have been accessed for the relevant time period. The only information available is the proportion of international divorces 1980-1989, which was 12%.

Slovenia has the lowest number of international divorce cases among the studied countries (256), which represent 11% of the total number of divorce cases. Data have only been accessed for 2004.

Italy: National figures have only been accessed for 2002. In this period 3,854 international divorces were granted in Italy, representing 9% of the total number of divorces.

Czech Republic : Data for 2003 (the only year available) identify that 4% (1,316 cases) of the total number of divorces in this country related to international marriages. Of these cases, 3.6% included foreigners only, whereas 32% (435 cases) were between a Czech national and a citizen of another EU Member State. 643 cases (47%) included a Czech and a third country national.

Portugal: The rate and the number of international divorces decreased in the period 2000 to 2003. In 2000, there were 748 international divorces in Portugal (4%), whilst in 2003 the number was down to 614 (3%). The highest number was noted in 2002, with 884 international divorces (3%).

Hungary : Data show that the percentage of international divorces is very low compared to other countries, only around 1.5% each year in the period 2000 to 2004. The number of cases has risen from 376 in 2000 to 421 in 2004. At the same time national divorces increased from 23,611 cases to 24,217 in 2004. In around 4% of the cases, the couple was composed by two foreigners, and about 15% involved a Hungarian and another EU citizen.

Austria : The data accessed for Austria do not include characteristics of the cases, but only provide the total number of cases and the nationality and sex of the persons involved. It is not possible to make a distinction between cases only involving Austrian nationals and cases with mixed couples. For instance, in 2000 there were 19,552 divorces in Austria, of which 17,943 involved Austrian men and 1,609 involved foreign men. The number of Austrian women was 18,020 and the number of foreign women was 1,532. It is not possible to retrieve information on who was married to whom. There is, however, an indication of an increasing rate of international divorces, in that the number of foreign individuals involved remained practically unchanged for both foreign men and women in 2002 and 2003, whilst the total number of divorces dropped by 850 cases (from 19,597 to 18,727).

IMPACT ASSESSMENT FOR THE PROPOSAL FOR A COUNCIL REGULATION AMENDING REGULATION (EC) NO 2201/2003 AS REGARDS JURISIDCTION AND INTRODUCING RULES CONCERNING APPLICABLE LAW IN MATRIMONIAL MATTERS (COM (2006) 399 final)(SEC(2006) 949)

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

IMPACT ASSESSMENT FOR THE PROPOSAL FOR A COUNCIL REGULATION AMENDING REGULATION (EC) NO 2201/2003 AS REGARDS JURISIDCTION AND INTRODUCING RULES CONCERNING APPLICABLE LAW IN MATRIMONIAL MATTERS

This Impact Assessment, which concerns applicable law and jurisdiction in divorce matters, has been drawn up on the basis of a study prepared for the Commission by an external contractor.[1] It describes the problems that international couples may encounter when they want to dissolve their marriage and sets out policy objectives of the proposal: to enhance legal certainty and predictability, increase flexibility and party autonomy, prevent "rush to court" by one spouse and ensure access to court.

The Impact Assessment identifies the following problems under the current situation:

- difficulties for spouses to predict which law will apply in matrimonial proceedings;
- insufficient flexibility for spouses to choose applicable law and competent court;
- risk of "rush to court" by one spouse and
- difficulties for couples of different nationalities living in third States.

The Impact Assessment analyses the above problems and presents six possible policy options: (1) status quo (2) increased cooperation between Member States, (3) harmonising conflict-of-law rules and introducing a limited possibility for spouses to choose applicable law,(4) revising the jurisdiction rules in Article 3 of Council Regulation 2201/2003, (5) giving the spouses a limited possibility to choose the competent court and (6) revising the rule on residual jurisdiction in Article 7 of Council Regulation 2201/2003.

An assessment of the benefits and disadvantages of the six policy options leads to the conclusion that none of the options would fully address all the problems, but that the most efficient response would be a combination of several policy options. The preferred policy option is therefore to harmonise the national conflict-of-law rules and giving the spouses a limited possibility to choose the applicable law (policy option 3), provide the spouses with a limited choice of jurisdiction (policy option 5) and to adopt common rules on residual jurisdiction to ensure access to court for EU citizens living in third States (policy option 6).

The increasing mobility of citizens within the European Union has resulted in an increasing number of international marriages where the spouses are of different nationalities or live in different Member States or live in a Member State of which they are not nationals. Part 3 of the Impact Assessment provides an extensive overview of the number of international divorces and marriages in the EU based on data from the Member States' statistical offices.

GREEN PAPER

on applicable law and jurisdiction in divorce matters

(presented by the Commission) {SEC(2005) 331}

GREEN PAPER

on applicable law and jurisdiction in divorce matters

The purpose of this Green Paper is to launch a wide-ranging consultation of interested parties on the questions of applicable law and jurisdiction in matrimonial matters. The Green Paper describes problems that may arise under the current situation and proposes a number of possible solutions. The attached Commission working document provides information on the Member States' substantive, procedural and conflict-of-law rules in divorce matters.

The Commission invites interested parties to submit comments before 30 September 2005 to the following address:

European CommissionDirectorate-General for Justice, Freedom and SecurityUnit C1 - Civil JusticeB - 1049 BrusselsFax: +32-2/299 64 57E-mail: jls-coop-jud-civil@cec.eu.int

Interested parties are requested to mention explicitly if they do not wish their comments to be published on the Commission's website.

The Commission plans to organise a public hearing on this subject. All those responding will be invited to attend.

1. BACKGROUND

There are currently no Community provisions on applicable law in divorce. Council Regulation (EC) No. 1347/2000[1] (the Brussels II Regulation) includes rules on jurisdiction and recognition in matrimonial matters, but does not comprise rules on applicable law. The entry into application of Council Regulation (EC) No. 2201/2003[2] (the new Brussels II Regulation), which replaces the Brussels II Regulation as of 1 March 2005, will not entail any change in this respect, since it takes over the rules on matrimonial matters from the Brussels II Regulation practically unchanged.

The European Council in Vienna emphasised in 1998 that the aim of a common judicial area is to make life simpler for the citizens, in particular in cases affecting the everyday life of the citizens, such as divorce.[3] In November 2004, the European Council invited the Commission to present a Green Paper on the conflict-of-law rules in matters relating to divorce (Rome III) in 2005.[4]

The increasing mobility of citizens within the European Union has resulted in an increasing number of international marriages where the spouses are of different nationalities, or live in different Member States or live in a Member State of which they are not nationals. In the event that an international couple decide to divorce, several laws may be invoked. The aim of the rules on applicable law, often referred to as conflict-of-law rules, is to determine which of the different laws that will apply. In view of the high number of divorces within the European Union, applicable law and international jurisdiction in divorce matters affect a considerable number of citizens. As an example, approximately 15 per cent of the divorces pronounced in Germany each year (approximately 30.000 couples) concern couples of different nationalities.[5]

2. SHORTCOMINGS OF THE CURRENT SITUATION

An international couple who want to divorce are subject to the jurisdiction rules of the new Brussels II Regulation, which allow the spouses to choose between several alternative grounds of jurisdiction (see point 3.6 of the attached working document). Once a divorce proceeding is brought before the courts of a Member State, the applicable law is determined pursuant to the national conflict-of-law rules of that State. There are significant differences between the national conflict-of-law rules (see point 3.4 of the attached working document).

The combination of different conflict-of-law rules and the current jurisdiction rules may give rise to a number of problems in the context of international divorces. Apart from the lack of legal certainty and flexibility, the current situation may also lead to results that do not correspond to the legitimate expectations of citizens. Moreover, Community citizens who are resident in a third State may face difficulties in finding a competent divorce court and to have a divorce judgment issued by a court in a third State recognised in their respective Member States of origin. There is finally a risk of rush to court under the current situation.

2.1. Lack of legal certainty and predictability for the spouses

Considering the difference between, and complexity of, the national conflict-of-law rules in divorce matters, it is often difficult to predict which national law will apply in a given case. This is particularly the case in family situations where the spouses have no common habitual residence or nationality, but the problem may also arise when couples of the same nationality split up and move to different Member States.

Example 1: the Portuguese-Italian couple living in different Member States A Portuguese man and an Italian woman get married in Italy. The husband returns immediately to Portugal after the wedding for professional reasons while the wife stays in Italy. After two years, the couple decide to divorce. The couple may apply for divorce in either Italy or Portugal pursuant to the new Brussels II Regulation. The courts in these States apply, in the first place, the law of the common nationality of the spouses. In the present case where the spouses are of different nationalities, the Italian courts would apply the law of the State where the marriage has been principally based. The Portuguese courts would instead apply the law of the spouses' common habitual residence, or, failing that, the law with which the spouses have the closest connection. The spouses find it difficult to predict what the applicable law will be in their situation. |

2.2. Insufficient party autonomy

The national conflict-of-law rules foresee in principle only one solution in a given situation, e.g. the application of the law of the spouses' nationality or the law of the forum (lex fori). This may in certain situations not be sufficiently flexible. It fails for example to take account of the fact that citizens may feel closely connected with a Member State although they are not nationals of that State. Introducing a certain degree of party autonomy allowing the parties to choose the applicable law could render the rules more flexible and enhance legal certainty and predictability for the spouses.

Example 2: the Italian couple living in Germany A couple of Italian nationality live in Munich since twenty years and feel perfectly integrated in German society. When their children leave home, the couple decide to divorce by consent. They would like to divorce under German law, with which they feel the most closely connected, and which requires only one year of separation in cases of divorce by consent, compared to three years of separation required under Italian law. The new Brussels II Regulation allows the spouses to apply for divorce in either Germany or Italy. Nevertheless, since German as well as Italian conflict-of-law rules are based, in the first place, on the common nationality of the spouses, the courts of both countries would apply Italian divorce law. |

2.3. Risk of results that do not correspond to the legitimate expectations of the citizens

Citizens are increasingly taking advantage of the benefits of the internal market by moving to another Member State for professional reasons. They are unlikely to be aware that the conditions for divorce may change drastically as a result of their move. This may happen for instance in the case where spouses of different nationalities move to a Member State of which none of them is a national. Since the new Brussels II Regulation does not allow spouses to apply for divorce in a Member State of which only one of them is a national in the absence of another connecting factor, spouses may find themselves in a situation where the only possibility is to seise the courts of the Member State of their habitual residence. This may in certain circumstances lead to results that do not correspond to their legitimate expectations.

Example 3: the Finnish/Swedish couple moving to Ireland A Finnish/Swedish couple move from Stockholm to Dublin where they are offered interesting jobs. Their marriage deteriorates and they finally decide to divorce. The couple would expect the divorce proceedings to be rather simple and swift, as it would be under Finnish or Swedish law, since they both want to divorce and do not have any children. However, only Irish courts have jurisdiction according to the new Brussels II Regulation and Irish courts apply Irish law (lex fori) to divorce proceedings, irrespective of the nationality of the spouses. The only way to ensure the application of Swedish or Finnish divorce law would be if a spouse returned to his or her Member State of origin for at least six months and then applied for divorce in that country. Neither spouse is willing or able to quit his or her job and leave Ireland for six months for this purpose. On the other hand, they want to avoid the application of Irish divorce law, which requires a four year separation period to establish that the marriage has broken down. They are surprised that the conditions for divorce have changed so dramatically, due to their decision to move to another Member State. |

2.4. Risk of difficulties for Community citizens living in a third State

Whilst the rules of recognition of the new Brussels II Regulation apply to all divorce judgments issued by a court of a Member State, the rules of jurisdiction do not cover all situations. This may give rise to difficulties for Community citizens living in a third State. Situations may arise where none of the grounds of jurisdiction of the Regulation is applicable. The courts of the Member States may in such circumstances avail themselves of the national rules on international jurisdiction. However, the fact that these rules are not harmonised may lead to situations where no court within the European Union or elsewhere is competent to divorce a couple of Community citizens of different nationalities who live in a third State. Moreover, if a divorce is pronounced in a third State, the couple may face serious difficulties to have the divorce recognised in their respective Member States of origin.

Example 4: the German/Dutch couple living in a third State A German/Dutch couple live in a third State since many years. Their relationship deteriorates and the German wife would like to divorce, preferably before a German court. However, she cannot apply for divorce in Germany or in any other Member State. None of the grounds of jurisdiction of the new Brussels II Regulation is applicable since the couple are not habitually resident in a Member State and are not of common nationality. In such circumstances, the courts of the Member States may avail themselves of their national rules of jurisdiction. However, the German wife cannot apply for divorce in Germany under the German rules of jurisdiction, since the Dutch husband can only be sued in Germany according to the jurisdiction rules of the Regulation according to Article 6, which offers a certain protection to respondents. Nor can she apply for divorce in the Netherlands, since Dutch law does not provide for internal jurisdiction rules in these circumstances. Consequently, the German wife is unable to apply for divorce in any Member State. Her only hope is that the courts of the third State will have jurisdiction to deal with the matter. Even if that would be the case, it may be difficult to have a divorce pronounced in the third State recognised in Germany. |

2.5. Risk of rush to court

The rule on lis pendens (see point 3.6.3 of the attached working document) may induce a spouse to apply for divorce before the other spouse has done so to prevent the courts of another Member State from acquiring jurisdiction (rush to court). This may lead to situations where an applicant applies for divorce in a particular Member State to obtain a certain result, e.g. to circumvent the application of a particular divorce law. Rush to court may have negative consequences for the defendant if it leads to the application of a law with which he or she does not feel closely connected and which does not take account of his or her interests. This risk may be illustrated by the following example:

Example 5: the Polish husband going to Finland to work A Polish couple, married since twenty years, live in Poland with their children. The husband receives an interesting offer to work in Finland for two years. The couple agree that the husband shall accept the offer and that the wife shall stay in Poland. After one year, the husband tells his wife that he wants to divorce. He is aware that divorce proceedings under Polish law are lengthy and that the court must establish that the marriage has broken down completely and irreparably. However, Finnish courts would have jurisdiction under the new Brussels II Regulation, since the husband has lived in Finland for more than one year. Finnish courts apply Finnish law to divorce proceedings according to the principle of lex fori. As a result, the Polish husband can obtain a divorce after six months' consideration period, notwithstanding his wife's objections. Since the husband wants to obtain a divorce as quickly as possible, he seises a Finnish court immediately, which pronounces the divorce after six months, despite the wife's strong objections. |

Question 1: Are you aware of other problems than those identified above that may arise in the context of international divorces? |

3. POSSIBLE WAYS FORWARD

3.1. Status quo

One possibility would be to leave the situation unchanged and not introduce any legislative change. It could be argued that the problems identified are not sufficiently serious or do not occur sufficiently frequently to warrant Community action.

3.2. Harmonising the conflict-of-law rules

A nother way of addressing the problem would be to introduce harmonised conflict-of-law rules based on a set of uniform connecting factors. This solution would have the advantage of ensuring legal certainty (example 1). Depending on the contents of the harmonised rules, it could also increase party autonomy (example 2) and contribute to finding satisfactory solutions for the citizens (example 3). It may at least partly reduce the need for rush to court (example 5), since any court seised would apply the divorce law designated on the basis of common rules.

The connecting factors would need to be carefully considered in order to ensure legal certainty and predictability and at the same time allow for some flexibility. The objective would be to ensure that a divorce is governed according to the legal order with which it has the closest connection. A number of connecting factors, which are commonly used in international instruments and national conflict laws, could be envisaged, such as the spouses' last common habitual residence, the common nationality of the spouses, the last common nationality if one spouse still retains it or lex fori.

Question 2: Are you in favour of harmonising conflict-of-law rules? What are the arguments for and against such solution? Question 3: What would be the most appropriate connecting factors? Question 4: Should the harmonised rules be confined to divorce or apply also to legal separation and marriage annulment? Question 5: Should the harmonised rules include a public policy clause enabling courts to refuse to apply a foreign law in certain circumstances? |

3.3. Providing to spouses the possibility to choose the applicable law

Another possibility would be to introduce a limited possibility for the spouses to choose the applicable law in divorce proceedings. The possibility to choose the applicable law could enhance legal certainty and predictability for the spouses in particular in divorces by mutual consent. A certain party autonomy would also render the rules more flexible than current rules which in principle only foresee one possible solution. It could finally facilitate access to courts in certain cases. This solution could be particularly useful when the spouses agree to divorce, such as the Portuguese-Italian couple (example 1) and the Italian couple living in Germany (example 2).

The principle of freedom of choice has increasingly been used in international conventions regarding choice-of-law in the field of contract law, but to a lesser extent in family law. There are nevertheless exceptions, such as the recent Belgian law on private international law that allows spouses to choose between the law of the nationality of one of the spouses or Belgian law (i.e. lex fori).[6]

To leave the parties an unlimited choice could result in the application of exotic laws with which the parties have little or no connection. It would therefore seem preferable to restrict the choice to certain laws with which the spouses are closely connected (e.g. by virtue of the nationality of one or both spouses, last common habitual residence or lex fori). One possibility would be to restrict the choice to the law of the forum State (lex fori) in order to ensure that courts would not be obliged to apply foreign law.

The modalities for the choice would obviously need to be further explored. It could be required that the choice should be expressed explicitly and in writing at the time the divorce application is introduced. One would also need to consider whether special safeguards would be needed to protect a spouse against undue pressure from the other spouse to choose a particular law. Special considerations may also be necessary if the spouses have children.

The choice of a law by the parties would obviously imply the choice of the substantive rules of the divorce forum, and not its rules on private international law (exclusion of so-called renvoi). The contrary would jeopardise the objective of creating legal certainty.

Question 6: Should the parties be allowed to choose applicable law? What are the arguments for and against such a solution? Question 7: Should the choice be limited to certain laws? If yes, what would be the appropriate connecting factors? Should it be limited to the laws of the Member States? Should the choice be limited to lex fori? Question 8: Should the possibility to choose applicable law be confined to divorce or should it apply also to legal separation and marriage annulment? Question 9: What should be the appropriate formal requirements for the parties' agreement on the choice of law? |

3.4. Revising the grounds of jurisdiction listed in Article 3 of Regulation No. 2201/2003

The grounds of jurisdiction listed in Article 3 of Council Regulation No. 2201/2003 were originally designed to meet objective requirements, to be in line with the interests of the parties, involve flexible rules to deal with mobility and to meet individuals' needs without sacrificing legal certainty.[7]

It could be argued that the jurisdiction rules do not entirely meet these objectives. In the absence of uniform conflict-of-law rules, the existence of several alternative grounds of jurisdiction may lead to the application of laws with which the spouses are not necessarily the most closely connected (example 5). On the other hand, the grounds of jurisdiction may in certain cases not be sufficiently flexible to meet individuals' needs (example 3).

One possibility could be to revise the jurisdiction rules. However, the consequences of any revision would need to be carefully considered. Hence, a restriction of the grounds of jurisdiction may have adverse consequences in terms of flexibility and access to courts, unless the parties are given the opportunity to choose the competent court (see below point 3.6). On the other hand, adding new grounds of jurisdiction may further exacerbate the lack of legal certainty.

Question 10: In your experience, does the existence of several grounds of jurisdiction result in rush to court? Question 11: Do you believe that the grounds of jurisdiction should be revised? If so, what would be the best solution? |

3.5. Revising the rule on residual jurisdiction in Article 7 of Regulation No. 2201/2003

Another question is whether the rule on residual jurisdiction of the new Brussels II Regulation should be revised. The current rules may lead to situations where no court in the European Union or indeed anywhere has jurisdiction to deal with a divorce application (example 4). In the event that a court of a third State has jurisdiction, the ensuing divorce decision is not recognised within the European Union pursuant to the new Brussels II Regulation, but only pursuant to national law or applicable international treaties. This is likely to cause difficulties if the couple subsequently seek to have the divorce recognised in their respective countries of origin.

Question 12: Do you consider that the harmonisation of the jurisdiction rules should be reinforced and that Article 7 of Regulation No. 2201/2003 should be deleted, or at least limited to cases where no EU citizens are involved? If yes, what should these rules look like? |

3.6. Providing to spouses the possibility to choose the competent court

Another way forward could be to allow the spouses to agree upon the competent court in divorce cases (prorogation of jurisdiction). To allow the parties to agree that a court or the courts of a certain Member State should have jurisdiction in divorce proceedings between them could enhance legal certainty and flexibility and be particularly useful in cases of divorces by consent.

Prorogation of jurisdiction could prove useful also in situations where the spouses are unable to seise a court of a Member State under the current jurisdiction rules, because they do not have common nationality or domicile. As an example, it would allow the Swedish-Finnish couple living in Ireland to agree that a Finnish or a Swedish court would have jurisdiction in their divorce proceeding (example 3). Similarly, it would allow the German-Dutch couple living in a third State to agree on a competent court (example 4). The court designated by the parties would apply the law designated under its national conflict-of-law rules.

The possibility to choose the competent court exists in several Community instruments. Prorogation is possible pursuant to Article 23 of Council Regulation (EC) No. 44/2001. Similarly, Article 12 of the new Brussels II Regulation foresees a limited possibility to choose competent court in matters of parental responsibility.

Prorogation in divorces could be limited to courts of Member States with which the spouses have a close connection, for example by virtue of the nationality or domicile of either spouse or the spouses' last common habitual residence. If the spouses have children, special attention should be paid to ensure coherence of any such rules with the prorogation rule of Article 12 of the new Brussels II Regulation. The modalities and timing for the choice would obviously need to be examined further.

Question 13: What are the arguments for and against introducing a possibility of prorogation in divorce cases? Question 14: Should prorogation be limited to certain jurisdictions? Question 15: What should be the formal requirements for the parties' prorogation agreement? |

3.7. Introducing the possibility to transfer a case

As explained above (point 2.5.), a spouse may in certain circumstances have an incentive to rush to court before the other spouse has done so. This may at least partly be explained by the lis pendens rule of the new Brussels II Regulation, which has been criticised as being too rigid and to give an incentive to spouses to strike first. A possible remedy could be to introduce a possibility to transfer a divorce case, in exceptional circumstances, to a court of another Member State. Article 15 of the new Brussels II Regulation provides for such possibility in matters of parental responsibility.

A transfer could be envisaged in exceptional circumstances and under strict conditions if a spouse applies for divorce in a Member State, but the defendant requests that the case be transferred to a court of another Member State on the basis that the marriage was principally based in that State. To safeguard legal certainty, the centre of gravity of a marriage could be established on the basis of a closed list of connecting factors, including for example the last common habitual residence of the spouses if one spouse still lives there and the common nationality of the spouses.

The modalities of a possible transfer mechanism would obviously need to be further elaborated to ensure in particular that it would not result in undue delays. Additional safeguards may be necessary if the divorce proceedings are linked to proceedings on parental responsibility to ensure coherence with Article 15 of the new Brussels II Regulation.

The possibility to transfer a case could provide a remedy to the problems that may arise when one spouse has unilaterally applied for divorce against the will of the other spouse. As an example, it would allow the Polish wife mentioned in example 5 to request the Finnish court to transfer the case to a Polish court on the basis that both spouses being Polish nationals and Poland being the last common habitual residence of the spouses, the centre of gravity of the marriage was situated in Poland.

Question 16: Should it be possible to request a transfer of a case to the court of another Member State? What are the arguments for and against such solution? Question 17: What should be the connecting factors to establish whether a case can be transferred to another Member State? Question 18: What safeguards would be necessary to ensure legal certainty and avoid undue delays? |

3.8. Combining different solutions

The ideas described above are examples of different ways forward. However, none of the ideas could by itself successfully solve all the problems described in chapter 2. One could therefore envisage a combination of different solutions.

As an example, spouses could be allowed to choose competent court based on the nationality of either spouse or their last habitual residence. In addition, spouses could be allowed to choose the applicable law, at least the application of lex fori. This combination could solve the problems described in examples 1-4 and be particularly useful in divorces by consent. To solve the problems that may arise where only one spouse wants to divorce (example 5), it could be envisaged to introduce a possibility to transfer a case to another Member State.

Question 19: Which combination of solutions do you believe would provide the most appropriate remedy to the problems described? Question 20: Would you suggest any other solution to solve the problems described in chapter 2? |

CONVENTION ON THE LAW APPLICABLE TO CONTRACTS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS

(Concluded December 22, 1986)

The States Parties to the present Convention,
Desiring to unify the choice of law rules relating to contracts for the international sale of goods,
Bearing in mind the United Nations Convention on contracts for the international sale of goods, concluded at Vienna on 11 April 1980,
Have agreed upon the following provisions –

CHAPTER I – SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

Article 1

This Convention determines the law applicable to contracts of sale of goods –
a) between parties having their places of business in different States;
b) in all other cases involving a choice between the laws of different States, unless such a choice arises solely from a stipulation by the parties as to the applicable law, even if accompanied by a choice of court or arbitration.

Article 2

The Convention does not apply to –
a) sales by way of execution or otherwise by authority of law;
b) sales of stocks, shares, investment securities, negotiable instruments or money; it does, however, apply to the sale of goods based on documents;
c) sales of goods bought for personal, family or household use; it does, however, apply if the seller at the time of the conclusion of the contract neither knew nor ought to have known that the goods were bought for any such use.

Article 3

For the purposes of the Convention, "goods" includes –
a) ships, vessels, boats, hovercraft and aircraft;
b) electricity.

Article 4

(1) Contracts for the supply of goods to be manufactured or produced are to be considered contracts of sale unless the party who orders the goods undertakes to supply a substantial part of the materials necessary for such manufacture or production.
(2) Contracts in which the preponderant part of the obligations of the party who furnishes goods consists of the supply of labour or other services are not to be considered contracts of sale.

Article 5

The Convention does not determine the law applicable to –
a) the capacity of the parties or the consequences of nullity or invalidity of the contract resulting from the incapacity of a party;
b) the question whether an agent is able to bind a principal, or an organ to bind a company or body corporate or unincorporate;
c) the transfer of ownership; nevertheless, the issues specifically mentioned in Article 12 are governed by the law applicable to the contract under the Convention;
d) the effect of the sale in respect of any person other than the parties;

e) agreements on arbitration or on choice of court, even if such an agreement is embodied in the contract of sale.

Article 6
The law determined under the Convention applies whether or not it is the law of a Contracting State.

CHAPTER II – APPLICABLE LAW
Section 1 – Determination of the applicable law
Article 7
(1) A contract of sale is governed by the law chosen by the parties. The parties' agreement on this choice must be express or be clearly demonstrated by the terms of the contract and the conduct of the parties, viewed in their entirety. Such a choice may be limited to a part of the contract.
(2) The parties may at any time agree to subject the contract in whole or in part to a law other than that which previously governed it, whether or not the law previously governing the contract was chosen by the parties. Any change by the parties of the applicable law made after the conclusion of the contract does not prejudice its formal validity or the rights of third parties.

Article 8
(1) To the extent that the law applicable to a contract of sale has not been chosen by the parties in accordance with Article 7, the contract is governed by the law of the State where the seller has his place of business at the time of conclusion of the contract.
(2) However, the contract is governed by the law of the State where the buyer has his place of business at the time of conclusion of the contract, if –
a) negotiations were conducted, and the contract concluded by and in the presence of the parties, in that State; or
b) the contract provides expressly that the seller must perform his obligation to deliver the goods in that State; or
c) the contract was concluded on terms determined mainly by the buyer and in response to an invitation directed by the buyer to persons invited to bid (a call for tenders).
(3) By way of exception, where, in the light of the circumstances as a whole, for instance any business relations between the parties, the contract is manifestly more closely connected with a law which is not the law which would otherwise be applicable to the contract under paragraphs 1 or 2 of this Article, the contract is governed by that other law.
(4) Paragraph 3 does not apply if, at the time of the conclusion of the contract, the seller and the buyer have their places of business in States having made the reservation under Article 21, paragraph 1, sub-paragraph b).
(5) Paragraph 3 does not apply in respect of issues regulated in the United Nations Convention on contracts for the international sale of goods (Vienna, 11 April 1980) where, at the time of the conclusion of the contract, the seller and the buyer have their places of business in different States both of which are Parties to that Convention.

Article 9
A sale by auction or on a commodity or other exchange is governed by the law chosen by the parties in accordance with Article 7 to the extent to which the law of the State where the auction takes place or the exchange is located does not prohibit such choice. Failing a choice by the parties, or to the extent that such choice is prohibited, the law of the State where the auction takes place or the exchange is located shall apply.

Article 10
(1) Issues concerning the existence and material validity of the consent of the parties as to the choice of the applicable law are determined, where the choice satisfies the requirements of Article 7, by the law chosen. If under that law the choice is invalid, the law governing the contract is determined under Article 8.
(2) The existence and material validity of a contract of sale, or of any term thereof, are determined by the law which under the Convention would govern the contract or term if it were valid.
(3) Nevertheless, to establish that he did not consent to the choice of law, to the contract itself, or to any term thereof, a party may rely on the law of the State where he has his place of business, if in the circumstances it is not reasonable to determine that issue under the law specified in the preceding paragraphs.

Article 11
(1) A contract of sale concluded between persons who are in the same State is formally valid if it satisfies the requirements either of the law which governs it under the Convention or of the law of the State where it is concluded.
(2) A contract of sale concluded between persons who are in different States is formally valid if it satisfies the requirements either of the law which governs it under the Convention or of the law of one of those States.
(3) Where the contract is concluded by an agent, the State in which the agent acts is the relevant State for the purposes of the preceding paragraphs.
(4) An act intended to have legal effect relating to an existing or contemplated contract of sale is formally valid if it satisfies the requirements either of the law which under the Convention governs or would govern the contract, or of the law of the State where the act was done.
(5) The Convention does not apply to the formal validity of a contract of sale where one of the parties to the contract has, at the time of its conclusion, his place of business in a State which has made the reservation provided for in Article 21, paragraph 1, sub-paragraph c).

Section 2 – Scope of the applicable law
Article 12
The law applicable to a contract of sale by virtue of Articles 7, 8 or 9 governs in particular –
a) interpretation of the contract;
b) the rights and obligations of the parties and performance of the contract;
c) the time at which the buyer becomes entitled to the products, fruits and income deriving from the goods;
d) the time from which the buyer bears the risk with respect to the goods;
e) the validity and effect as between the parties of clauses reserving title to the goods;
f) the consequences of non-performance of the contract, including the categories of loss for which compensation may be recovered, but without prejudice to the procedural law of the forum;
g) the various ways of extinguishing obligations, as well as prescription and limitation of actions;
h) the consequences of nullity or invalidity of the contract.

Article 13
In the absence of an express clause to the contrary, the law of the State where inspection of the goods takes place applies to the modalities and procedural requirements for such inspection.

CHAPTER III – GENERAL PROVISIONS
Article 14
(1) If a party has more than one place of business, the relevant place of business is that which has the closest relationship to the contract and its performance, having regard to the circumstances known to or contemplated by the parties at any time before or at the conclusion of the contract.
(2) If a party does not have a place of business, reference is to be made to his habitual residence.

Article 15
In the Convention "law" means the law in force in a State other than its choice of law rules.

Article 16
In the interpretation of the Convention, regard is to be had to its international character and to the need to promote uniformity in its application.

Article 17
The Convention does not prevent the application of those provisions of the law of the forum that must be applied irrespective of the law that otherwise governs the contract.

Article 18
The application of a law determined by the Convention may be refused only where such application would be manifestly incompatible with public policy (ordre public).

Article 19
For the purpose of identifying the law applicable under the Convention, where a State comprises several territorial units each of which has its own system of law or its own rules of law in respect of contracts for the sale of goods, any reference to the law of that State is to be construed as referring to the law in force in the territorial unit in question.

Article 20
A State within which different territorial units have their own systems of law or their own rules of law in respect of contracts of sale is not bound to apply the Convention to conflicts between the laws in force in such units.

Article 21
(1) Any State may, at the time of signature, ratification, acceptance, approval or accession make any of the following reservations –
a) that it will not apply the Convention in the cases covered by sub-paragraph b) of Article 1;
b) that it will not apply paragraph 3 of Article 8, except where neither party to the contract has his place of business in a State which has made a reservation provided for under this sub-paragraph;
c) that, for cases where its legislation requires contracts of sale to be concluded in or evidenced by writing, it will not apply the Convention to the formal validity of the contract, where any party has his place of business in its territory at the time of conclusion of the contract;
d) that it will not apply sub-paragraph g) of Article 12 in so far as that sub-paragraph relates to prescription and limitation of actions.
(2) No other reservation shall be permitted.
(3) Any Contracting State may at any time withdraw a reservation which it has made; the reservation shall cease to have effect on the first day of the month following the expiration of three months after notification of the withdrawal.

Article 22
(1) This Convention does not prevail over any convention or other international agreement which has been or may be entered into and which contains provisions determining the law applicable to contracts of sale, provided that such instrument applies only if the seller and buyer have their places of business in States Parties to that instrument.
(2) This Convention does not prevail over any international convention to which a Contracting State is, or becomes, a Party, regulating the choice of law in regard to any particular category of contracts of sale within the scope of this Convention.

Article 23
This Convention does not prejudice the application –
a) of the United Nations Convention on contracts for the international sale of goods (Vienna, 11 April 1980);
b) of the Convention on the limitation period in the international sale of goods (New York, 14 June 1974), or the Protocol amending that Convention (Vienna, 11 April 1980).

Article 24
The Convention applies in a Contracting State to contracts of sale concluded after its entry into force for that State.

CHAPTER IV – FINAL CLAUSES
Article 25

(2) The Convention is subject to ratification, acceptance or approval by the signatory States.
(3) The Convention is open for accession by all States which are not signatory States as from the date it is open for signature.
(4) Instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval and accession shall be deposited with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, depositary of the Convention.

Article 26

b) for a territorial unit to which the Convention has been extended in conformity with Article 26 on the first day of the month following the expiration of three months after the notification referred to in that Article.

Article 28

Article 29
Any State which becomes a Party to this Convention after the entry into force of an instrument revising it shall be considered to be a Party to the Convention as revised.

Convention on the Law Applicable to International Sale Of Goods

The States signatory to this Convention;

Desiring to establish common provisions concerning the law applicable to sales of goods;

Have resolved to conclude a Convention for this purpose and have agreed on the following provisions:

Article 1

This Convention shall apply to international sales of goods.

It shall not apply to sales of securities, to sales of ships and of registered boats or aircraft, or to sales upon judicial order or by way of execution. It shall apply to sales based on documents.

For the purposes of this Convention, contracts to deliver goods to be manufactured or produced shall be placed on the same footing as sales provided the party who assumes delivery is to furnish the necessary raw materials for their manufacture or production.

The mere declaration of the parties, relative to the application of a law or the competence of a judge or arbitrator, shall not be sufficient to confer upon a sale the international character provided for in the first paragraph of this Article.

Article 2

A sale shall be governed by the domestic law of the country designated by the Contracting Parties.

Such designation must be contained in an express clause, or unambiguously result from the provisions of the contract.

Conditions affecting the consent of the parties to the law declared applicable shall be determined by such law.

Article 3

In default of a law declared applicable by the parties under the conditions provided in the preceding Article, a sale shall be governed by the domestic law of the country in which the vendor has his habitual residence at the time when he receives the order. If the order is received by an establishment of the vendor, the sale shall be governed by the domestic law of the country in which the establishment is situated.

Nevertheless, a sale shall be governed by the domestic law of the country in which the purchaser has his habitual residence, or in which he has the establishment that has given the order, if the order has been received in such country, whether by the vendor or by his representative, agent or commercial traveller.

In case of a sale at an exchange or at a public auction, the sale shall be governed by the domestic law of the country in which the exchange is situated or the auction takes place.

Article 4

In the absence of an express clause to the contrary, the domestic law of the country in which inspection of goods delivered pursuant to a sale is to take place shall apply in respect of the form in which and the periods within which the inspection must take place, the notifications concerning the inspection and the measures to be taken in case of refusal of the goods.

Article 5

This Convention shall not apply to:

1. The capacity of the parties;

2. The form of the contract;

3. The transfer of ownership, provided that the various obligations of the parties, and especially those relating to risks, shall be subject to the law applicable to the sale pursuant to this Convention;

4. The effects of the sale as regards all persons other than the parties.

Article 6

In each of the Contracting States, the application of the law determined by this convention may be excluded on a ground of public policy.

Article 7

The contracting States have agreed to incorporate the provisions of Articles 1-6 of this Convention in the national law of their respective countries.

Article 8

This Convention shall be open for signature by the States represented at the seventh session of the Hague Conference on Private International Law.

It shall be ratified, and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands.

A record shall be made of each deposit of instruments of ratification, a certified copy of which shall be transmitted through the diplomatic channel to each signatory States.

Article 9

This Convention shall enter into force on the sixtieth day following the deposit of the fifth instrument of ratification in accordance with the provisions of article 8, second paragraph.

For each signatory State subsequently ratifying the Convention, it shall enter into force on the sixtieth day following the date of deposit of the instrument of ratification of that State.

Article 10

This Convention shall apply to the metropolitan territories of the Contracting States as matter of course.

If a Contracting State wishes the Convention to be applicable to all its other territories, or to those of its other territories for the international relations of which it is responsible, it shall give notice of its intention in this regard by an instrument which shall be deposited with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands. The latter shall transmit through the diplomatic channel a certified copy thereof to each of the Contracting States. The Convention shall enter into force as regards such territories on the sixtieth day following the date of deposit of the above-mentioned instrument of notification.

It is understood that the notification provided for in the second paragraph of this article shall not take effect until after the entry into force of the Convention pursuant to article 9, first paragraph.

Article 11

Any State not represented at the seventh session of The Hague Conference on Private International Law may accede to this Convention. A State desiring to accede shall give notice of its intention by an instrument which shall be deposited with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands. The latter shall transmit through the diplomatic channel a certified copy thereof to each of the Contracting States. The Convention shall enter into force as regards the acceding State on the sixtieth day following the date of deposit of the instrument of accession.

It is understood that the deposit of the instrument of accession may not take place until after the entry into force of the Convention pursuant to article 9, first paragraph.

Article 12

This Convention shall have a duration of five years from the date specified in article 9, first paragraph. This period shall begin to run as from that date even for the States which ratify or accede to the Convention subsequently.

The Convention shall be renewed by tacit agreement for successive periods of five years unless it is denounced.

Notice of denunciation must be given, at least six months before the expiration of the period, to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Netherlands, which shall notify all the other Contracting States thereof.

The denunciation may be limited to the territories, or to certain of the territories, specified in a notification made pursuant to article 10, second paragraph.

The denunciation shall have effect only as regards the States effecting it. The Convention shall remain in force for the other Contracting States.

UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION ON CONTRACTS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS (1980)

CONTENTS

II. EXPLANATORY NOTE BY THE UNCITRAL SECRETARIAT ON THE UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION ON CONTRACTS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS

I. United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods

PREAMBLE

The States Parties to this Convention,

Bearing in mind the broad objectives in the resolutions adopted by the sixth special session of the General Assembly of the United Nations on the establishment of a New International Economic Order,

Considering that the development of international trade on the basis of equality and mutual benefit is an important element in promoting friendly relations among States,

Being of the opinion that the adoption of uniform rules which govern contracts for the international sale of goods and take into account the different social, economic and legal systems would contribute to the removal of legal barriers in international trade and promote the development of international trade,

Have agreed as follows:

Part I. Sphere of application and general provisions

CHAPTER 1. SPHERE OF APPLICATION

Article 1

(1) This Convention applies to contracts of sale of goods between parties whose places of business are in different States:

(a) when the States are Contracting States; or

(b) when the rules of private international law lead to the application of the law of a Contracting State.

(2) The fact that the parties have their places of business in different States is to be disregarded whenever this fact does not appear either from the contract or from any dealings between, or from information disclosed by, the parties at any time before or at the conclusion of the contract.

(3) Neither the nationality of the parties nor the civil or commercial character of the parties or of the contract is to be taken into consideration in determining the application of this Convention.

Article 2

This Convention does not apply to sales:

(a) of goods bought for personal, family or household use, unless the seller, at any time before or at the conclusion of the contract, neither knew nor ought to have known that the goods were bought for any such use;
(b) by auction;
(c) on execution or otherwise by authority of law;
(d) of stocks, shares, investment securities, negotiable instruments or money;
(e) of ships, vessels, hovercraft or aircraft;
(f) of electricity.

Article 3

(1) Contracts for the supply of goods to be manufactured or produced are to be considered sales unless the party who orders the goods undertakes to supply a substantial part of the materials necessary for such manufacture or production.

(2) This Convention does not apply to contracts in which the preponderant part of the obligations of the party who furnishes the goods consists in the supply of labour or other services.

Article 4

This Convention governs only the formation of the contract of sale and the rights and obligations of the seller and the buyer arising from such a contract. In particular, except as otherwise expressly provided in this Convention, it is not concerned with:

(a) the validity of the contract or of any of its provisions or of any usage;
(b) the effect which the contract may have on the property in the goods sold.

Article 5

This Convention does not apply to the liability of the seller for death or personal injury caused by the goods to any person.

Article 6

The parties may exclude the application of this Convention or, subject to article 12, derogate from or vary the effect of any of its provisions.

CHAPTER II. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 7

(1) In the interpretation of this Convention, regard is to be had to its international character and to the need to promote uniformity in its application and the observance of good faith in international trade.

(2) Questions concerning matters governed by this Convention which are not expressly settled in it are to be settled in conformity with the general principles on which it is based or, in the absence of such principles, in conformity with the law applicable by virtue of the rules of private international law.

Article 8

(1) For the purposes of this Convention statements made by and other conduct of a party are to be interpreted according to his intent where the other party knew or could not have been unaware what that intent was.

(2) If the preceding paragraph is not applicable, statements made by and other conduct of a party are to be interpreted according to the understanding that a reasonable person of the same kind as the other party would have had in the same circumstances.

(3) In determining the intent of a party or the understanding a reasonable person would have had, due consideration is to be given to all relevant circumstances of the case including the negotiations, any practices which the parties have established between themselves, usages and any subsequent conduct of the parties.

Article 9

(1) The parties are bound by any usage to which they have agreed and by any practices which they have established between themselves.

(2) The parties are considered, unless otherwise agreed, to have impliedly made applicable to their contract or its formation a usage of which the parties knew or ought to have known and which in international trade is widely known to, and regularly observed by, parties to contracts of the type involved in the particular trade concerned.

Article 10

For the purposes of this Convention:

(a) if a party has more than one place of business, the place of business is that which has the closest relationship to the contract and its performance, having regard to the circumstances known to or contemplated by the parties at any time before or at the conclusion of the contract;
(b) if a party does not have a place of business, reference is to be made to his habitual residence.

Article 11

A contract of sale need not be concluded in or evidenced by writing and is not subject to any other requirement as to form. It may be proved by any means, including witnesses.

Article 12

Any provision of article 11, article 29 or Part II of this Convention that allows a contract of sale or its modification or termination by agreement or any offer, acceptance or other indication of intention to be made in any form other than in writing does not apply where any party has his place of business in a Contracting State which has made a declaration under article 96 of this Convention. The parties may not derogate from or vary the effect of this article.

Article 13

For the purposes of this Convention "writing" includes telegram and telex.

Part II. Formation of the contract

Article 14

(1) A proposal for concluding a contract addressed to one or more specific persons constitutes an offer if it is sufficiently definite and indicates the intention of the offeror to be bound in case of acceptance. A proposal is sufficiently definite if it indicates the goods and expressly or implicitly fixes or makes provision for determining the quantity and the price.

(2) A proposal other than one addressed to one or more specific persons is to be considered merely as an invitation to make offers, unless the contrary is clearly indicated by the person making the proposal.

Article 15

(1) An offer becomes effective when it reaches the offeree.

(2) An offer, even if it is irrevocable, may be withdrawn if the withdrawal reaches the offeree before or at the same time as the offer.

Article 16

(1) Until a contract is concluded an offer may be revoked if the revocation reaches the offeree before he has dispatched an acceptance.

(2) However, an offer cannot be revoked:

(a) if it indicates, whether by stating a fixed time for acceptance or otherwise, that it is irrevocable; or
(b) if it was reasonable for the offeree to rely on the offer as being irrevocable and the offeree has acted in reliance on the offer.

Article 17

An offer, even if it is irrevocable, is terminated when a rejection reaches the offeror.

Article 18

(1) A statement made by or other conduct of the offeree indicating assent to an offer is an acceptance. Silence or inactivity does not in itself amount to acceptance.

(2) An acceptance of an offer becomes effective at the moment the indication of assent reaches the offeror. An acceptance is not effective if the indication of assent does not reach the offeror within the time he has fixed or, if no time is fixed, within a reasonable time, due account being taken of the circumstances of the transaction, including the rapidity of the means of communication employed by the offeror. An oral offer must be accepted immediately unless the circumstances indicate otherwise.

(3) However, if, by virtue of the offer or as a result of practices which the parties have established between themselves or of usage, the offeree may indicate assent by performing an act, such as one relating to the dispatch of the goods or payment of the price, without notice to the offeror, the acceptance is effective at the moment the act is performed, provided that the act is performed within the period of time laid down in the preceding paragraph.

Article 19

(1) A reply to an offer which purports to be an acceptance but contains additions, limitations or other modifications is a rejection of the offer and constitutes a counteroffer.

(2) However, a reply to an offer which purports to be an acceptance but contains additional or different terms which do not materially alter the terms of the offer constitutes an acceptance, unless the offeror, without undue delay, objects orally to the discrepancy or dispatches a notice to that effect. If he does not so object, the terms of the contract are the terms of the offer with the modifications contained in the acceptance.

(3) Additional or different terms relating, among other things, to the price, payment, quality and quantity of the goods, place and time of delivery, extent of one party's liability to the other or the settlement of disputes are considered to alter the terms of the offer materially.

Article 20

(1) A period of time of acceptance fixed by the offeror in a telegram or a letter begins to run from the moment the telegram is handed in for dispatch or from the date shown on the letter or, if no such date is shown, from the date shown on the envelope. A period of time for acceptance fixed by the offeror by telephone, telex or other means of instantaneous communication, begins to run from the moment that the offer reaches the offeree.

(2) Official holidays or non-business days occurring during the period for acceptance are included in calculating the period. However, if a notice of acceptance cannot be delivered at the address of the offeror on the last day of the period because that day falls on an official holiday or a non-business day at the place of business of the offeror, the period is extended until the first business day which follows.

Article 21

(1) A late acceptance is nevertheless effective as an acceptance if without delay the offeror orally so informs the offeree or dispatches a notice to that effect.

(2) If a letter or other writing containing a late acceptance shows that it has been sent in such circumstances that if its transmission had been normal it would have reached the offeror in due time, the late acceptance is effective as an acceptance unless, without delay, the offeror orally informs the offeree that he considers his offer as having lapsed or dispatches a notice to that effect.

Article 22

An acceptance may be withdrawn if the withdrawal reaches the offeror before or at the same time as the acceptance would have become effective.

Article 23

A contract is concluded at the moment when an acceptance of an offer becomes effective in accordance with the provisions of this Convention.

Article 24

For the purposes of this Part of the Convention, an offer, declaration of acceptance or any other indication of intention "reaches" the addressee when it is made orally to him or delivered by any other means to him personally, to his place of business or mailing address or, if he does not have a place of business or mailing address, to his habitual residence.

Part III. Sale of goods

CHAPTER I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 25

A breach of contract committed by one of the parties is fundamental if it results in such detriment to the other party as substantially to deprive him of what he is entitled to expect under the contract, unless the party in breach did not foresee and a reasonable person of the same kind in the same circumstances would not have foreseen such a result.

Article 26

A declaration of avoidance of the contract is effective only if made by notice to the other party.

Article 27

Unless otherwise expressly provided in this Part of the Convention, if any notice, request or other communication is given or made by a party in accordance with this Part and by means appropriate in the circumstances, a delay or error in the transmission of the communication or its failure to arrive does not deprive that party of the right to rely on the communication.

Article 28

If, in accordance with the provisions of this Convention, one party is entitled to require performance of any obligation by the other party, a court is not bound to enter a judgement for specific performance unless the court would do so under its own law in respect of similar contracts of sale not governed by this Convention.

Article 29

(1) A contract may be modified or terminated by the mere agreement of the parties.

(2) A contract in writing which contains a provision requiring any modification or termination by agreement to be in writing may not be otherwise modified or terminated by agreement. However, a party may be precluded by his conduct from asserting such a provision to the extent that the other party has relied on that conduct.

CHAPTER II. OBLIGATIONS OF THE SELLER

Article 30

The seller must deliver the goods, hand over any documents relating to them and transfer the property in the goods, as required by the contract and this Convention.

Section I. Delivery of the goods and handing over of documents

Article 31

If the seller is not bound to deliver the goods at any other particular place, his obligation to deliver consists:

(a) if the contract of sale involves carriage of the goods--in handing the goods over to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer;
(b) if, in cases not within the preceding subparagraph, the contract relates to specific goods, or unidentified goods to be drawn from a specific stock or to be manufactured or produced, and at the time of the conclusion of the contract the parties knew that the goods were at, or were to be manufactured or produced at, a particular place--in placing the goods at the buyer's disposal at that place;
(c) in other cases--in placing the goods at the buyer's disposal at the place where the seller had his place of business at the time of the conclusion of the contract.

Article 32

(1) If the seller, in accordance with the contract or this Convention, hands the goods over to a carrier and if the goods are not dearly identified to the contract by markings on the goods, by shipping documents or otherwise, the seller must give the buyer notice of the consignment specifying the goods.

(2) If the seller is bound to arrange for carriage of the goods, he must make such contracts as are necessary for carriage to the place fixed by means of transportation appropriate in the circumstances and according to the usual terms for such transportation.

(3) If the seller is not bound to effect insurance in respect of the carriage of the goods, he must, at the buyer's request, provide him with all available information necessary to enable him to effect such insurance.

Article 33

The seller must deliver the goods:

(a) if a date is fixed by or determinable from the contract, on that date;
(b) if a period of time is fixed by or determinable from the contract, at any time within that period unless circumstances indicate that the buyer is to choose a date; or
(c) in any other case, within a reasonable time after the conclusion of the contract.

Article 34

If the seller is bound to hand over documents relating to the goods, he must hand them over at the time and place and in the form required by the contract. If the seller has handed over documents before that time, he may, up to that time, cure any lack of conformity in the documents, if the exercise of this right does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or unreasonable expense. However, the buyer retains any right to claim damages as provided for in this Convention.

Section II. Conformity of the goods and third party claims

Article 35

(1) The seller must deliver goods which are of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract and which are contained or packaged in the manner required by the contract.

(2) Except where the parties have agreed otherwise, the goods do not conform with the contract unless they:

(a) are fit for the purposes for which goods of the same description would ordinarily be used;
(b) are fit for any particular purpose expressly or impliedly made known to the seller at the time of the conclusion of the contract, except where the circumstances show that the buyer did not rely, or that it was unreasonable for him to rely, on the seller's skill and judgement;
(c) possess the qualities of goods which the seller has held out to the buyer as a sample or model;
(d) are contained or packaged in the manner usual for such goods or, where there is no such manner, in a manner adequate to preserve and protect the goods.

(3) The seller is not liable under subparagraphs (a) to (d) of the preceding paragraph for any lack of conformity of the goods if at the time of the conclusion of the contract the buyer knew or could not have been unaware of such lack of conformity.

Article 36

(1) The seller is liable in accordance with the contract and this Convention for any lack of conformity which exists at the time when the risk passes to the buyer, even though the lack of conformity becomes apparent only after that time.

(2) The seller is also liable for any lack of conformity which occurs after the time indicated in the preceding paragraph and which is due to a breach of any of his obligations, including a breach of any guarantee that for a period of time the goods will remain fit for their ordinary purpose or for some particular purpose or will retain specified qualities or characteristics.

Article 37

If the seller has delivered goods before the date for delivery, he may, up to that date, deliver any missing part or make up any deficiency in the quantity of the goods delivered, or deliver goods in replacement of any non-conforming goods delivered or remedy any lack of conformity in the goods delivered, provided that the exercise of this right does not cause the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or unreasonable expense. However, the buyer retains any right to claim damages as provided for in this Convention.

Article 38

(1) The buyer must examine the goods, or cause them to be examined, within as short a period as is practicable in the circumstances.

(2) If the contract involves carriage of the goods, examination may be deferred until after the goods have arrived at their destination.

(3) If the goods are redirected in transit or redispatched by the buyer without a reasonable opportunity for examination by him and at the time of the conclusion of the contract the seller knew or ought to have known of the possibility of such redirection or redispatch, examination may be deferred until after the goods have arrived at the new destination.

Article 39

(1) The buyer loses the right to rely on a lack of conformity of the goods if he does not give notice to the seller specifying the nature of the lack of conformity within a reasonable time after he has discovered it or ought to have discovered it.

(2) In any event, the buyer loses the right to rely on a lack of conformity of the goods if he does not give the seller notice thereof at the latest within a period of two years from the date on which the goods were actually handed over to the buyer, unless this time-limit is inconsistent with a contractual period of guarantee.

Article 40

The seller is not entitled to rely on the provisions of articles 38 and 39 if the lack of conformity relates to facts of which he knew or could not have been unaware and which he did not disclose to the buyer.

Article 41

The seller must deliver goods which are free from any right or claim of a third party, unless the buyer agreed to take the goods subject to that right or claim. However, if such right or claim is based on industrial property or other intellectual property, the seller's obligation is governed by article 42.

Article 42

(1) The seller must deliver goods which are free from any right or claim of a third party based on industrial property or other intellectual property, of which at the time of the conclusion of the contract the seller knew or could not have been unaware, provided that the right or claim is based on industrial property or other intellectual property:

(a) under the law of the State where the goods will be resold or otherwise used, if it was contemplated by the parties at the time of the conclusion of the contract that the goods would be resold or otherwise used in that State; or
(b) in any other case, under the law of the State where the buyer has his place of business.

(2) The obligation of the seller under the preceding paragraph does not extend to cases where:

(a) at the time of the conclusion of the contract the buyer knew or could not have been unaware of the right or claim; or

(b) the right or claim results from the seller's compliance with technical drawings, designs, formulae or other such specifications furnished by the buyer.

Article 43

(1) The buyer loses the right to rely on the provisions of article 41 or article 42 if he does not give notice to the seller specifying the nature of the right or claim of the third party within a reasonable time after he has become aware or ought to have become aware of the right or claim.

(2) The seller is not entitled to rely on the provisions of the preceding paragraph if he knew of the right or claim of the third party and the nature of it.

Article 44

Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of article 39 and paragraph (1) of article 43, the buyer may reduce the price in accordance with article 50 or claim damages, except for loss of profit, if he has a reasonable excuse for his failure to give the required notice.

Section III. Remedies for breach of contract by the seller

Article 45

(1) If the seller fails to perform any of his obligations under the contract or this Convention, the buyer may:

(a) exercise the rights provided in articles 46 to 52;
(b) claim damages as provided in articles 74 to 77.

(2) The buyer is not deprived of any right he may have to claim damages by exercising his right to other remedies.

(3) No period of grace may be granted to the seller by a court or arbitral tribunal when the buyer resorts to a remedy for breach of contract.

Article 46

(1) The buyer may require performance by the seller of his obligations unless the buyer has resorted to a remedy which is inconsistent with this requirement.

(2) If the goods do not conform with the contract, the buyer may require delivery of substitute goods only if the lack of conformity constitutes a fundamental breach of contract and a request for substitute goods is made either in conjunction with notice given under article 39 or within a reasonable time thereafter.

(3) If the goods do not conform with the contract, the buyer may require the seller to remedy the lack of conformity by repair, unless this is unreasonable having regard to all the circumstances. A request for repair must be made either in conjunction with notice given under article 39 or within a reasonable time thereafter.

Article 47

(1) The buyer may fix an additional period of time of reasonable length for performance by the seller of his obligations.

(2) Unless the buyer has received notice from the seller that he will not perform within the period so fixed, the buyer may not, during that period, resort to any remedy for breach of contract. However, the buyer is not deprived thereby of any right he may have to claim damages for delay in performance.

Article 48

(1) Subject to article 49, the seller may, even after the date for delivery, remedy at his own expense any failure to perform his obligations, if he can do so without unreasonable delay and without causing the buyer unreasonable inconvenience or uncertainty of reimbursement by the seller of expenses advanced by the buyer. However, the buyer retains any right to claim damages as provided for in this Convention.

(2) If the seller requests the buyer to make known whether he will accept performance and the buyer does not comply with the request within a reasonable time, the seller may perform within the time indicated in his request. The buyer may not, during that period of time, resort to any remedy which is inconsistent with performance by the seller.

(3) A notice by the seller that he will perform within a specified period of time is assumed to include a request, under the preceding paragraph, that the buyer make known his decision.

(4) A request or notice by the seller under paragraph (2) or (3) of this article is not effective unless received by the buyer.

Article 49

(1) The buyer may declare the contract avoided:

(a) if the failure by the seller to perform any of his obligations under the contract or this Convention amounts to a fundamental breach of contract; or
(b) in case of non-delivery, if the seller does not deliver the goods within the additional period of time fixed by the buyer in accordance with paragraph (1) of article 47 or declares that he will not deliver within the period so fixed.

(2) However, in cases where the seller has delivered the goods, the buyer loses the right to declare the contract avoided unless he does so:

(a) in respect of late delivery, within a reasonable time after he has become aware that delivery has been made;
(b) in respect of any breach other than late delivery, within a reasonable time:

(i) after he knew or ought to have known of the breach;
(ii) after the expiration of any additional period of time fixed by the buyer in accordance with paragraph (1) of article 47, or after the seller has declared that he will not perform his obligations within such an additional period; or
(iii) after the expiration of any additional period of time indicated by the seller in accordance with paragraph (2) of article 48, or after the buyer has declared that he will not accept performances.

Article 50

If the goods do not conform with the contract and whether or not the price has already been paid, the buyer may reduce the price in the same proportion as the value that the goods actually delivered had at the time of the delivery bears to the value that conforming goods would have had at that time. However, if the seller remedies any failure to perform his obligations in accordance with article 37 or article 48 or if the buyer refuses to accept performance by the seller in accordance with those articles, the buyer may not reduce the price.

Article 51

(1) If the seller delivers only a part of the goods or if only a part of the goods delivered is in conformity with the contract, articles 46 to 50 apply in respect of the part which is missing or which does not conform.

(2) The buyer may declare the contract avoided in its entirety only if the failure to make delivery completely or in conformity with the contract amounts to a fundamental breach of the contract.

Article 52

(1) If the seller delivers the goods before the date fixed, the buyer may take delivery or refuse to take delivery.

(2) If the seller delivers a quantity of goods greater than that provided for in the contract, the buyer may take delivery or refuse to take delivery of the excess quantity. If the buyer takes delivery of all or part of the excess quantity, he must pay for it at the contract rate.

CHAPTER III. OBLIGATIONS OF THE BUYER

Article 53

The buyer must pay the price for the goods and take delivery of them as required by the contract and this Convention.

Section I. Payment of the price

Article 54

The buyer's obligation to pay the price includes taking such steps and complying with such formalities as may be required under the contract or any laws and regulations to enable payment to be made.

Article 55

Where a contract has been validly concluded but does not expressly or implicitly fix or make provision for determining the price, the parties are considered, in the absence of any indication to the contrary, to have impliedly made reference to the price generally charged at the time of the conclusion of the contract for such goods sold under comparable circumstances in the trade concerned.

Article 56

If the price is fixed according to the weight of the goods, in case of doubt it is to be determined by the net weight.

Article 57

(1) If the buyer is not bound to pay the price at any other particular place, he must pay it to the seller:

(a) at the seller's place of business; or
(b) if the payment is to be made against the handing over of the goods or of documents, at the place where the handing over takes place.

(2) The seller must bear any increase in the expenses incidental to payment which is caused by a change in his place of business subsequent to the conclusion of the contract.

Article 58

(1) If the buyer is not bound to pay the price at any other specific time, he must pay it when the seller places either the goods or documents controlling their disposition at the buyer's disposal in accordance with the contract and this Convention. The seller may make such payment a condition for handing over the goods or documents.

(2) If the contract involves carriage of the goods, the seller may dispatch the goods on terms whereby the goods, or documents controlling their disposition, will not be handed over to the buyer except against payment of the price.

(3) The buyer is not bound to pay the price until he has had an opportunity to examine the goods, unless the procedures for delivery or payment agreed upon by the parties are inconsistent with his having such an opportunity.

Article 59

The buyer must pay the price on the date fixed by or determinable from the contract and this Convention without the need for any request or compliance with any formality on the part of the seller.

Section II. Taking delivery

Article 60

The buyer's obligation to take delivery consists:

(a) in doing all the acts which could reasonably be expected of him in order to enable the seller to make delivery; and
(b) in taking over the goods.

Section III. Remedies for breach of contract by the buyer

Article 61

(1) If the buyer fails to perform any of his obligations under the contract or this Convention, the seller may:

(a) exercise the rights provided in articles 62 to 65;
(b) claim damages as provided in articles 74 to 77.

(2) The seller is not deprived of any right he may have to claim damages by exercising his right to other remedies.

(3) No period of grace may be granted to the buyer by a court or arbitral tribunal when the seller resorts to a remedy for breach of contract.

Article 62

The seller may require the buyer to pay the price, take delivery or perform his other obligations, unless the seller has resorted to a remedy which is inconsistent with this requirement.

Article 63

(1) The seller may fix an additional period of time of reasonable length for performance by the buyer of his obligations.

(2) Unless the seller has received notice from the buyer that he will not perform within the period so fixed, the seller may not, during that period, resort to any remedy for breach of contract. However, the seller is not deprived thereby of any right he may have to claim damages for delay in performance.

Article 64

(1) The seller may declare the contract avoided:

(a) if the failure by the buyer to perform any of his obligations under the contract or this Convention amounts to a fundamental breach of contract; or
(b) if the buyer does not, within the additional period of time fixed by the seller in accordance with paragraph (1) of article 63, perform his obligation to pay the price or take delivery of the goods, or if he declares that he will not do so within the period so fixed;

(2) However, in cases where the buyer has paid the price, the seller loses the right to declare the contract avoided unless he does so:

(a) in respect of late performance by the buyer, before the seller has become aware that performance has been rendered; or
(b) in respect of any breach other than late performance by the buyer, within a reasonable time:

(i) after the seller knew or ought to have known of the breach; or
(ii) after the expiration of any additional period of time fixed by the seller in accordance with paragraph (1) of article 63, or after the buyer has declared that he will not perform his obligations within such an additional period.

Article 65

(1) If under the contract the buyer is to specify the form, measurement or other features of the goods and he fails to make such specification either on the date agreed upon or within a reasonable time after receipt of a request from the seller, the seller may, without prejudice to any other rights he may have, make the specification himself in accordance with the requirements of the buyer that may be known to him.

(2) If the seller makes the specification himself, he must inform the buyer of the details thereof and must fix a reasonable time within which the buyer may make a different specification. If, after receipt of such a communication, the buyer fails to do so within the time so fixed, the specification made by the seller is binding.

CHAPTER IV. PASSING OF RISK

Article 66

Loss of or damage to the goods after the risk has passed to the buyer does not discharge him from his obligation to pay the price, unless the loss or damage is due to an act or omission of the seller.

Article 67

(1) If the contract of sale involves carriage of the goods and the seller is not bound to hand them over at a particular place, the risk passes to the buyer when the goods are handed over to the first carrier for transmission to the buyer in accordance with the contract of sale. If the seller is bound to hand the goods over to a carrier at a particular place, the risk does not pass to the buyer until the goods are handed over to the carrier at that place. The fact that the seller is authorized to retain documents controlling the disposition of the goods does not affect the passage of the risk.

(2) Nevertheless, the risk does not pass to the buyer until the goods are clearly identified to the contract, whether by markings on the goods, by shipping documents, by notice given to the buyer or otherwise.

Article 68

The risk in respect of goods sold in transit passes to the buyer from the time of the conclusion of the contract. However, if the circumstances so indicate, the risk is assumed by the buyer from the time the goods were handed over to the carrier who issued the documents embodying the contract of carriage. Nevertheless, if at the time of the conclusion of the contract of sale the seller knew or ought to have known that the goods had been lost or damaged and did not disclose this to the buyer, the loss or damage is at the risk of the seller.

Article 69

(1) In cases not within articles 67 and 68, the risk passes to the buyer when he takes over the goods or, if he does not do so in due time, from the time when the goods are placed at his disposal and he commits a breach of contract by failing to take delivery.

(2) However, if the buyer is bound to take over the goods at a place other than a place of business of the seller, the risk passes when delivery is due and the buyer is aware of the fact that the goods are placed at his disposal at that place.

(3) If the contract relates to goods not then identified, the goods are considered not to be placed at the disposal of the buyer until they are clearly identified to the contract.

Article 70

If the seller has committed a fundamental breach of contract, articles 67, 68 and 69 do not impair the remedies available to the buyer on account of the breach.

CHAPTER V. PROVISIONS COMMON TO THE OBLIGATIONS OF THE SELLER AND OF THE BUYER

Section I. Anticipatory breach and instalment contracts

Article 71

(1) A party may suspend the performance of his obligations if, after the conclusion of the contract, it becomes apparent that the other party will not perform a substantial part of his obligations as a result of:

(a) a serious deficiency in his ability of perform or in his creditworthiness; or
(b) his conduct in preparing to perform or in performing the contract.

(2) If the seller has already dispatched the goods before the grounds described in the preceding paragraph become evident, he may prevent the handing over of the goods to the buyer even though the buyer holds a document which entitles him to obtain them. The present paragraph relates only to the rights in the goods as between the buyer and the seller.

(3) A party suspending performance, whether before or after dispatch of the goods, must immediately give notice of the suspension to the other party and must continue with performance if the other party provides adequate assurance of his performance.

Article 72

(1) If prior to the date for performance of the contract it is clear that one of the parties will commit a fundamental breach of contract, the other party may declare the contract avoided.

(2) If time allows, the party intending to declare the contract avoided must give reasonable notice to the other party in order to permit him to provide adequate assurance of his performance.

(3) The requirements of the preceding paragraph do not apply if the other party has declared that he will not perform his obligations.

Article 73

(1) In the case of a contract for delivery of goods by instalments, if the failure of one party to perform any of his obligations in respect of any instalment constitutes a fundamental breach of contract with respect to that instalment, the other party may declare the contract avoided with respect to that instalment.

(2) If one party's failure to perform any of his obligations in respect of any instalment gives the other party good grounds to conclude that a fundamental breach of contract will occur with respect to future installments, he may declare the contract avoided for the future, provided that he does so within a reasonable time.

(3) A buyer who declares the contract avoided in respect of any delivery may, at the same time, declare it avoided in respect of deliveries already made or of future deliveries if, by reason of their interdependence, those deliveries could not be used for the purpose contemplated by the parties at the time of the conclusion of the contract.

Section II. Damages

Article 74

Damages for breach of contract by one party consist of a sum equal to the loss, including loss of profit, suffered by the other party as a consequence of the breach. Such damages may not exceed the loss which the party in breach foresaw or ought to have foreseen at the time of the conclusion of the contract, in the light of the facts and matters of which he then knew or ought to have known, as a possible consequence of the breach of contract.

Article 75

If the contract is avoided and if, in a reasonable manner and within a reasonable time after avoidance, the buyer has bought goods in replacement or the seller has resold the goods, the party claiming damages may recover the difference between the contract price and the price in the substitute transaction as well as any further damages recoverable under article 74.

Article 76

(1) If the contract is avoided and there is a current price for the goods, the party claiming damages may, if he has not made a purchase or resale under article 75, recover the difference between the price fixed by the contract and the current price at the time of avoidance as well as any further damages recoverable under article 74. If, however, the party claiming damages has avoided the contract after taking over the goods, the current price at the time of such taking over shall be applied instead of the current price at the time of avoidance.

(2) For the purposes of the preceding paragraph, the current price is the price prevailing at the place where delivery of the goods should have been made or, if there is no current price at that place, the price at such other place as serves as a reasonable substitute, making due allowance for differences in the cost of transporting the goods.

Article 77

A party who relies on a breach of contract must take such measures as are reasonable in the circumstances to mitigate the loss, including loss of profit, resulting from the breach. If he fails to take such measures, the party in breach may claim a reduction in the damages in the amount by which the loss should have been mitigated.

Section III. Interest

Article 78

If a party fails to pay the price or any other sum that is in arrears, the other party is entitled to interest on it, without prejudice to any claim for damages recoverable under article 74.

Section IV. Exemption

Article 79

(1) A party is not liable for a failure to perform any of his obligations if he proves that the failure was due to an impediment beyond his control and that he could not reasonably be expected to have taken the impediment into account at the time of the conclusion of the contract or to have avoided or overcome it or its consequences.

(2) If the party's failure is due to the failure by a third person whom he has engaged to perform the whole or a part of the contract, that party is exempt from liability only if:

(a) he is exempt under the preceding paragraph; and
(b) the person whom he has so engaged would be so exempt if the provisions of that paragraph were applied to him.

(3) The exemption provided by this article has effect for the period during which the impediment exists.

(4) The party who fails to perform must give notice to the other party of the impediment and its effect on his ability to perform. If the notice is not received by the other party within a reasonable time after the party who fails to perform knew or ought to have known of the impediment, he is liable for damages resulting from such nonreceipt.

(5) Nothing in this article prevents either party from exercising any right other than to claim damages under this Convention.

Article 80

A party may not rely on a failure of the other party to perform, to the extent that such failure was caused by the first party's act or omission.

Section V. Effects of avoidance

Article 81

(1) Avoidance of the contract releases both parties from their obligations under it, subject to any damages which may be due. Avoidance does not affect any provision of the contract for the settlement of disputes or any other provision of the contract governing the rights and obligations of the parties consequent upon the avoidance of the contract.

(2) A party who has performed the contract either wholly or in part may claim restitution from the other party of whatever the first party has supplied or paid under the contract. If both parties are bound to make restitution, they must do so concurrently.

Article 82

(1) The buyer loses the right to declare the contract avoided or to require the seller to deliver substitute goods if it is impossible for him to make restitution of the goods substantially in the condition in which he received them.

(2) The preceding paragraph does not apply:

(a) if the impossibility of making restitution of the goods or of making restitution of the goods substantially in the condition in which the buyer received them is not due to his act or omission;
(b) the goods or part of the goods have perished or deteriorated as a result of the examination provided for in article 38; or
(c) if the goods or part of the goods have been sold in the normal course of business or have been consumed or transformed by the buyer in the course of normal use before he discovered or ought to have discovered the lack of conformity.

Article 83

A buyer who has lost the right to declare the contract avoided or to require the seller to deliver substitute goods in accordance with article 82 retains all other remedies under the contract and this Convention.

Article 84

(1) If the seller is bound to refund the price, he must also pay interest on it, from the date on which the price was paid.

(2) The buyer must account to the seller for all benefits which he has derived from the goods or part of them:

(a) if he must make restitution of the goods or part of them; or
(b) if it is impossible for him to make restitution of all or part of the goods or to make restitution of all or part of the goods substantially in the condition in which he received them, but he has nevertheless declared the contract avoided or required the seller to deliver substitute goods.

Section VI. Preservation of the goods

Article 85

If the buyer is in delay in taking delivery of the goods or, where payment of the price and delivery of the goods are to be made concurrently, if he fails to pay the price, and the seller is either in possession of the goods or otherwise able to control their disposition, the seller must take such steps as are reasonable in the circumstances to preserve them. He is entitled to retain them until he has been reimbursed his reasonable expenses by the buyer.

Article 86

(1) If the buyer has received the goods and intends to exercise any right under the contract or this Convention to reject them, he must take such steps to preserve them as are reasonable in the circumstances. He is entitled to retain them until he has been reimbursed his reasonable expenses by the seller.

(2) If goods dispatched to the buyer have been placed at his disposal at their destination and he exercises the right to reject them, he must take possession of them on behalf of the seller, provided that this can be done without payment of the price and without unreasonable inconvenience or unreasonable expense. This provision does not apply if the seller or a person authorized to take charge of the goods on his behalf is present at the destination. If the buyer takes possession of the goods under this paragraph, his rights and obligations are governed by the preceding paragraph.

Article 87

A party who is bound to take steps to preserve the goods may deposit them in a warehouse of a third person at the expense of the other party provided that the expense incurred is not unreasonable.

Article 88

(1) A party who is bound to preserve the goods in accordance with article 85 or 86 may sell them by any appropriate means if there has been an unreasonable delay by the other party in taking possession of the goods or in taking them back or in paying the price or the cost of preservation, provided that reasonable notice of the intention to sell has been given to the other party.

(2) If the goods are subject to rapid deterioration or their preservation would involve unreasonable expense, a party who is bound to preserve the goods in accordance with article 85 or 86 must take reasonable measures to sell them. To the extent possible he must give notice to the other party of his intention to sell.

(3) A party selling the goods has the right to retain out of the proceeds of sale an amount equal to the reasonable expenses of preserving the goods and of selling them. He must account to the other party for the balance.

Part IV. Final provisions

Article 89

The Secretary-General of the United Nations is hereby designated as the depositary for this Convention.

Article 90

This Convention does not prevail over any international agreement which has already been or may be entered into and which contains provisions concerning the matters governed by this Convention, provided that the parties have their places of business in States parties, to such agreement.

Article 91

(1) This Convention is open for signature at the concluding meeting of the United Nations Conference on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods and will remain open for signature by all States at the Headquarters of the United Nations, New York until 30 September 1981.

(2) This Convention is subject to ratification, acceptance or approval by the signatory States.

(3) This Convention is open for accession by all States which are not signatory States as from the date it is open for signature.

(4) Instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval and accession are to be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Article 92

(1) A Contracting State may declare at the time of signature, ratification, acceptance, approval or accession that it will not be bound by Part II of this Convention or that it will not be bound by Part III of this Convention.

(2) A Contracting State which makes a declaration in accordance with the preceding paragraph in respect of Part II or Part III of this Convention is not to be considered a Contracting State within paragraph (1) of article 1 of this Convention in respect of matters governed by the Part to which the declaration applies.

Article 93

(1) If a Contracting State has two or more territorial units in which, according to its constitution, different systems of law are applicable in relation to the matters dealt with in this Convention, it may, at the time of signature, ratification, acceptance, approval or accession, declare that this Convention is to extend to all its territorial units or only to one or more of them, and may amend its declaration by submitting another declaration at any time.

(2) These declarations are to be notified to the depositary and are to state expressly the territorial units to which the Convention extends.

(3) If, by virtue of a declaration under this article, this Convention extends to one or more but not all of the territorial units of a Contracting State, and if the place of business of a party is located in that State, this place of business, for the purposes of this Convention, is considered not to be in a Contracting State, unless it is in a territorial unit to which the Convention extends.

(4) If a Contracting State makes no declaration under paragraph (1) of this article, the Convention is to extend to all territorial units of that State.

Article 94

(1) Two or more Contracting States which have the same or closely related legal rules on matters governed by this Convention may at any time declare that the Convention is not to apply to contracts of sale or to their formation where the parties have their places of business in those States. Such declarations may be made jointly or by reciprocal unilateral declarations.

(2) A Contracting State which has the same or closely related legal rules on matters governed by this Convention as one or more non-Contracting States may at any time declare that the Convention is not to apply to contracts of sale or to their formation where the parties have their places of business in those States.

(3) If a State which is the object of a declaration under the preceding paragraph subsequently becomes a Contracting State, the declaration made will, as from the date on which the Convention enters into force in respect of the new Contracting State, have the effect of a declaration made under paragraph (1), provided that the new Contracting State joins in such declaration or makes a reciprocal unilateral declaration.

Article 95

Any State may declare at the time of the deposit of its instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession that it will not be bound by subparagraph (1) (b) of article 1 of this Convention.

Article 96

A Contracting State whose legislation requires contracts of sale to be concluded in or evidenced by writing may at any time make a declaration in accordance with article 12 that any provision of article 11, article 29, or Part II of this Convention, that allows a contract of sale or its modification or termination by agreement or any offer, acceptance, or other indication of intention to be made in any form other than in writing, does not apply where any party has his place of business in that State.

Article 97

(1) Declarations made under this Convention at the time of signature are subject to confirmation upon ratification, acceptance or approval.

(2) Declarations and confirmations of declarations are to be in writing and be formally notified to the depositary.

(3) A declaration takes effect simultaneously with the entry into force of this Convention in respect of the State concerned. However, a declaration of which the depositary receives formal notification after such entry into force takes effect on the first day of the month following the expiration of six months after the date of its receipt by the depositary. Reciprocal unilateral declarations under article 94 take effect on the first day of the month following the expiration of six months after the receipt of the latest declaration by the depositary.

(4) Any State which makes a declaration under this Convention may withdraw it at any time by a formal notification in writing addressed to the depositary. Such withdrawal is to take effect on the first day of the month following the expiration of six months after the date of the receipt of the notification by the depositary.

(5) A withdrawal of a declaration made under article 94 renders inoperative, as from the date on which the withdrawal takes effect, any reciprocal declaration made by another State under that article.

Article 98

No reservations are permitted except those expressly authorized in this Convention.

Article 99

(1) This Convention enters into force, subject to the provisions of paragraph (6) of this article, on the first day of the month following the expiration of twelve months after the date of deposit of the tenth instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession, including an instrument which contains a declaration made under article 92.

(2) When a State ratifies, accepts, approves or accedes to this Convention after the deposit of the tenth instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession, this Convention, with the exception of the Part excluded, enters into force in respect of that State, subject to the provisions of paragraph (6) of this article, on the first day of the month following the expiration of twelve months after the date of the deposit of its instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession.

(3) A State which ratifies, accepts, approves or accedes to this Convention and is a party to either or both the Convention relating to a Uniform Law on the Formation of Contracts for the International Sale of Goods done at The Hague on 1 July 1964 (1964 Hague Formation Convention) and the Convention relating to a Uniform Law on the International Sale of Goods done at The Hague on 1 July 1964 (1964 Hague Sales Convention) shall at the same time denounce, as the case may be, either or both the 1964 Hague Sales Convention and the 1964 Hague Formation Convention by notifying the Government of the Netherlands to that effect.

(4) A State party to the 1964 Hague Sales Convention which ratifies, accepts, approves or accedes to the present Convention and declares or has declared under article 92 that it will not be bound by Part II of this Convention shall at the time of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession denounce the 1964 Hague Sales Convention by notifying the Government of the Netherlands to that effect.

(5) A State party to the 1964 Hague Formation Convention which ratifies, accepts, approves or accedes to the present Convention and declares or has declared under article 92 that it will not be bound by Part III of this Convention shall at the time of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession denounce the 1964 Hague Formation Convention by notifying the Government of the Netherlands to that effect.

(6) For the purpose of this article, ratifications, acceptances, approvals and accessions in respect of this Convention by States parties to the 1964 Hague Formation Convention or to the 1964 Hague Sales Convention shall not be effective until such denunciations as may be required on the part of those States in respect of the latter two Conventions have themselves become effective. The depositary of this Convention shall consult with the Government of the Netherlands, as the depositary of the 1964 Conventions, so as to ensure necessary co-ordination in this respect.

(1) This Convention applies to the formation of a contract only when the proposal for concluding the contract is made on or after the date when the Convention enters into force in respect of the Contracting States referred to in subparagraph (1) (a) or the Contracting State referred to in subparagraph (1) (b) of article 1.

(2) This Convention applies only to contracts concluded on or after the date when the Convention enters into force in respect of the Contracting States referred to in subparagraph (1)(a) or the Contracting State referred to in subparagraph (1)(b) of article 1.

Article 101

(1) A Contracting State may denounce this Convention, or Part II or Part III of the Convention, by a formal notification in writing addressed to the depositary.

(2) The denunciation takes effect on the first day of the month following the expiration of twelve months after the notification is received by the depositary. Where a longer period for the denunciation to take effect is specified in the notification, the denunciation takes effect upon the expiration of such longer period after the notification is received by the depositary.

DONE at Vienna, this day of eleventh day of April, one thousand nine hundred and eighty, in a single original, of which the Arabic, Chinese, English, French, Russian and Spanish texts are equally authentic.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the undersigned plenipotentiaries, being duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this Convention.

II. EXPLANATORY NOTE BY THE UNCITRAL SECRETARIAT ON THE UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION ON CONTRACTS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL SALE OF GOODS*

INTRODUCTION

1. The United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods provides a uniform text of law for international sales of goods. The Convention was prepared by the United Nations

Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL) and adopted by a diplomatic conference on 11 April 1980.

2. Preparation of a uniform law for the international sale of goods began in 1930 at the International Institute for the Unification of Private Law (UNIDROIT) in Rome. After a long interruption in the work as a result of the Second World War, the draft was submitted to a diplomatic conference in The Hague in 1964, which adopted two conventions, one on the international sale of goods and the other on the formation of contracts for the international sale of goods.

3. Almost immediately upon the adoption of the two conventions there was wide-spread criticism of their provisions as reflecting primarily the legal traditions and economic realities of continental Western Europe, which was the region that had most actively contributed to their preparation. As a result, one of the first tasks undertaken by UNCITRAL on its organization in 1968 was to enquire of States whether or not they intended to adhere to those conventions and the reasons for their positions. In the light of the responses received, UNCITRAL decided to study the two conventions to ascertain which modifications might render them capable of wider acceptance by countries of different legal, social and economic systems. The result of this study was the adoption by diplomatic conference on 11 April 1980 of the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods, which combines the subject matter of the two prior conventions.

4. UNCITRAL's success in preparing a Convention with wider acceptability is evidenced by the fact that the original eleven States for which the Convention came into force on 1 January 1988 included States from every geographical region, every stage of economic development and every major legal, social and economic system. The original eleven States were: Argentina, China, Egypt, France, Hungary, Italy, Lesotho, Syria, United States, Yugoslavia and Zambia.

5. As of 31 January 1988, an additional four States, Austria, Finland, Mexico and Sweden, had become a party to the Convention.

6. The Convention is divided into four parts. Part One deals with the scope of application of the Convention and the general provisions. Part Two contains the rules governing the formation of contracts for the international sale of goods. Part Three deals with the substantive rights and obligations of buyer and seller arising from the contract. Part Four contains the final clauses of the Convention concerning such matters as how and when it comes into force, the reservations and declarations that are permitted and the application of the Convention to international sales where both States concerned have the same or similar law on the subject.

Part One. Scope of application and general provisions

A. Scope of application

7. The articles on scope of application state both what is included in the coverage of the Convention and what is excluded from it. The provisions on inclusion are the most important. The Convention applies to contracts of sale of goods between parties whose places of business are in different States and either both of those States are Contracting States or the rules of private international law lead to the law of a Contracting State. A few States have availed themselves of the authorization in article 95 to declare that they would apply the Convention only in the former and not in the latter of these two situations. As the Convention becomes more widely adopted, the practical significance of such a declaration will diminish.

8. The final clauses make two additional restrictions on the territorial scope of application that will be relevant to a few States. One applies only if a State is a party to another international agreement that contains provisions concerning matters governed by this Convention; the other permits States that have the same or similar domestic law of sales to declare that the Convention does not apply between them.

9. Contracts of sale are distinguished from contracts for services in two respects by article 3. A contract for the supply of goods to be manufactured or produced is considered to be a sale unless the party who orders the goods undertakes to supply a substantial part of the materials necessary for their manufacture or production. When the preponderant part of the obligations of the party who furnishes the goods consists in the supply of labour or other services, the Convention does not apply.

10. The Convention contains a list of types of sales that are excluded from the Convention, either because of the purpose of the sale (goods bought for personal, family or household use), the nature of the sale (sales by auction, on execution or otherwise by law) or the nature of the goods (stocks, shares, investment securities, negotiable instruments, money, ships, vessels, hovercraft, aircraft or electricity). In many States some or all of such sales are governed by special rules reflecting their special nature.

11. Several articles make clear that the subject matter of the Convention is restricted to the formation of the contract and the rights and duties of the buyer and seller arising from such a contract. In particular, the Convention is not concerned with the validity of the contract, the effect which the contract may have on the property in the goods sold or the liability of the seller for death or personal injury caused by the goods to any person.

B. Party autonomy

12. The basic principle of contractual freedom in the international sale of goods is recognized by the provision that permits the parties to exclude the application of this Convention or derogate from or vary the effect of any of its provisions. The exclusion of the Convention would most often result from the choice by the parties of the law of a non-contracting State or of the domestic law of a contracting State to be the law applicable to the contract. Derogation from the Convention would occur whenever a provision in the contract provided a different rule from that found in the Convention.

C. Interpretation of the Convention

13. This Convention for the unification of the law governing the international sale of goods will better fulfill its purpose if it is interpreted in a consistent manner in all legal systems. Great care was taken in its preparation to make it as clear and easy to understand as possible. Nevertheless, disputes will arise as to its meaning and application. When this occurs, all parties, including domestic courts and arbitral tribunals, are admonished to observe its international character and to promote uniformity in its application and the observance of good faith in international trade. In particular, when a question concerning a matter governed by this Convention is not expressly settled in it, the question is to be settled in conformity with the general principles on which the Convention is based. Only in the absence of such principles should the matter be settled in conformity with the law applicable by virtue of the rules of private international law.

D. Interpretation of the contract; usages

14. The Convention contains provisions on the manner in which statements and conduct of a party are to be interpreted in the context of the formation of the contract or its implementation. Usages agreed to by the parties, practices they have established between themselves and usages of which the parties knew or ought to have known and which are widely known to, and regularly observed by, parties to contracts of the type involved in the particular trade concerned may all be binding on the parties to the contract of sale.

E. Form of the contract

15. The Convention does not subject the contract of sale to any requirement as to form. In particular, article 11 provides that no written agreement is necessary for the conclusion of the contract. However, if the contract is in writing and it contains a provision requiring any modification or termination by agreement to be in writing, article 29 provides that the contract may not be otherwise modified or terminated by agreement. The only exception is that a party may be precluded by his conduct from asserting such a provision to the extent that the other person has relied on that conduct.

16. In order to accommodate those States whose legislation requires contracts of sale to be concluded in or evidenced by writing, article 96 entitles those States to declare that neither article 11 nor the exception to article 29 applies where any party to the contract has his place of business in that State.

Part Two. Formation of the contract

17. Part Two of the Convention deals with a number of questions that arise in the formation of the contract by the exchange of an offer and an acceptance. When the formation of the contract takes place in this manner, the contract is concluded when the acceptance of the offer becomes effective.

18. In order for a proposal for concluding a contract to constitute an offer, it must be addressed to one or more specific persons and it must be sufficiently definite. For the proposal to be sufficiently definite, it must indicate the goods and expressly or implicitly fix or make provision for determining the quantity and the price.

19. The Convention takes a middle position between the doctrine of the revocability of the offer until acceptance and its general irrevocability for some period of time. The general rule is that an offer may be revoked. However, the revocation must reach the offeree before he has dispatched an acceptance. Moreover, an offer cannot be revoked if it indicates that it is irrevocable, which it may do by stating a fixed time for acceptance or otherwise. Furthermore, an offer may not be revoked if it was reasonable for the offeree to rely on the offer as being irrevocable and the offeree has acted in reliance on the offer.

20. Acceptance of an offer may be made by means of a statement or other conduct of the offeree indicating assent to the offer that is communicated to the offerer. However, in some cases the acceptance may consist of performing an act, such as dispatch of the goods or payment of the price. Such an act would normally be effective as an acceptance the moment the act was performed.

21. A frequent problem in contract formation, perhaps especially in regard to contracts of sale of goods, arises out of a reply to an offer that purports to be an acceptance but contains additional or different terms. Under the Convention, if the additional or different terms do not materially alter the terms of the offer, the reply constitutes an acceptance, unless the offeror without undue delay objects to those terms. If he does not object, the terms of the contract are the terms of the offer with the modifications contained in the acceptance.

22. If the additional or different terms do materially alter the terms of the contract, the reply constitutes a counter-offer that must in turn be accepted for a contract to be concluded. Additional or different terms relating, among other things, to the price, payment, quality and quantity of the goods, place and time of delivery, extent of one party's liability to the other or settlement of disputes are considered to alter the terms of the offer materially.

Part Three. Sale of goods

A. Obligations of the seller

23. The general obligations of the seller are to deliver the goods, hand over any documents relating to them and transfer the property in the goods, as required by the contract and this Convention. The Convention provides supplementary rules for use in the absence of contractual agreement as to when, where and how the seller must perform these obligations.

24. The Convention provides a number of rules that implement the seller's obligations in respect of the quality of the goods. In general, the seller must deliver goods that are of the quantity, quality and description required by the contract and that are contained or packaged in the manner required by the contract. One set of rules of particular importance in international sales of goods involves the seller's obligation to deliver goods that are free from any right or claim of a third party, including rights based on industrial property or other intellectual property.

25. In connection with the seller's obligations in regard to the quality of the goods, the Convention contains provisions on the buyer's obligation to inspect the goods. He must give notice of any lack of their conformity with the contract within a reasonable time after he has discovered it or ought to have discovered it, and at the latest two years from the date on which the goods were actually handed over to the buyer, unless this time-limit is inconsistent with a contractual period of guarantee.

B. Obligations of the buyer

26. Compared to the obligations of the seller, the general obligations of the buyer are less extensive and relatively simple; they are to pay the price for the goods and take delivery of them as required by the contract and the Convention. The Convention provides supplementary rules for use in the absence of contractual agreement as to how the price is to be determined and where and when the buyer should perform his obligation to pay the price.

C. Remedies for breach of contract

27. The remedies of the buyer for breach of contract by the seller are set forth in connection with the obligations of the seller and the remedies of the seller are set forth in connection with the obligations of the buyer. This makes it easier to use and understand the Convention.

28. The general pattern of remedies is the same in both cases. If all the required conditions are fulfilled, the aggrieved party may require performance of the other party's obligations, claim damages or avoid the contract. The buyer also has the right to reduce the price where the goods delivered do not conform with the contract.

29. Among the more important limitations on the right of an aggrieved party to claim a remedy is the concept of fundamental breach. For a breach of contract to be fundamental, it must result in such detriment to the other party as substantially to deprive him of what he is entitled to expect under the contract, unless the result was neither foreseen by the party in breach nor foreseeable by a reaonsable person of the same kind in the same circumstances. A buyer can require the delivery of substitute goods only if the goods delivered were not in conformity with the contract and the lack of conformity constituted a fundamental breach of contract. The existence of a fundamental breach is one of the two circumstances that justifies a declaration of avoidance of a contract by the aggrieved party; the other circumstance being that, in the case of non-delivery of the goods by the seller or non-payment of the price or failure to take delivery by the buyer, the party in breach fails to perform within a reasonable period of time fixed by the aggrieved party.

30. Other remedies may be restricted by special circumstances. For example, if the goods do not conform with the contract, the buyer may require the seller to remedy the lack of conformity by repair, unless this is unreasonable having regard to all the circumstances. A party cannot recover damages that he could have mitigated by taking the proper measures. A party may be exempted from paying damages by virtue of an impediment beyond his control.

D. Passing of risk

31. Determining the exact moment when the risk of loss or damage to the goods passes from the seller to the buyer is of great importance in contracts for the international sale of goods. Parties may regulate that issue in their contract either by an express provision or by the use of a trade term. However, for the frequent case where the contract does not contain such a provision, the Convention sets forth a complete set of rules.

32. The two special situations contemplated by the Convention are when the contract of sale involves carriage of the goods and when the goods are sold while in transit. In all other cases the risk passes to the buyer when he takes over the goods or from the time when the goods are placed at his disposal and he commits a breach of contract by failing to take delivery, whichever comes first. In the frequent case when the contract relates to goods that are not then identified, they must be identified to the contract before they can be considered to be placed at the disposal of the buyer and the risk of their loss can be considered to have passed to him.

E. Suspension of performance and anticipatory breach

33. The Convention contains special rules for the situation in which, prior to the date on which performance is due, it becomes apparent that one of the parties will not perform a substantial part of his obligations or will commit a fundamental breach of contract. A distinction is drawn between those cases in which the other party may suspend his own performance of the contract but the contract remains in existence awaiting future events and those cases in which he may declare the contract avoided.

F. Exemption from liability to pay damages

34. When a party fails to perform any of his obligations due to an impediment beyond his control that he could not reasonably have been expected to take into account at the time of the conclusion of the contract and that he could not have avoided or overcome, he is exempted from paying damages. This exemption may also apply if the failure is due to the failure of a third person whom he has engaged to perform the whole or a part of the contract. However, he is subject to any other remedy, including reduction of the price, if the goods were defective in some way.

G. Preservation of the goods

35. The Convention imposes on both parties the duty to preserve any goods in their possession belonging to the other party. Such a duty is of even greater importance in an international sale of goods where the other party is from a foreign country and may not have agents in the country where the goods are located. Under certain circumstances the party in possession of the goods may sell them, or may even be required to sell them. A party selling the goods has the right to retain out of the proceeds of sale an amount equal to the reasonable expenses of preserving the goods and of selling them and must account to the other party for the balance.

Part Four. Final clauses

36. The final clauses contain the usual provisions relating to the Secretary-General as depositary and providing that the Convention is subject to ratification, acceptance or approval by those States that signed it by 30 September 1981, that it is open to accession by all States that are not signatory States and that the text is equally authentic in Arabic, Chinese, English, French, Russian and Spanish.

37. The Convention permits a certain number of declarations. Those relative to scope of application and the requirement as to a written contract have been mentioned above. There is a special declaration for States that have different systems of law governing contracts of sale in different parts of their territory. Finally, a State may declare that it will not be bound by Part II on formation of contracts or Part III on the rights and obligations of the buyer and seller. This latter declaration was included as part of the decision to combine into one convention the subject matter of the two 1964 Hague Conventions.

1968 Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (consolidated version)

1968 Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (consolidated version)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The signing on 29 November 1996 of the Convention on the accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden to the Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters and to the Protocol on its interpretation by the Court of Justice has made it desirable, as with previous accessions, for legal practitioners to be provided with an up-to-date consolidated version of the texts of the Brussels Convention and of that Protocol published in Official Journal of the European Communities C 189 of 28 July 1990.

These texts are accompanied by three Declarations by the representatives of the Governments of the Member States, one made in 1978 in connection with the International Convention relating to the arrest of sea-going ships, another in 1989 concerning the ratification of the Convention on the accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic and the last in 1996 on jurisdiction for cases where, in the framework of the provision of services, workers are posted in a Member State other than that in which their work is normally performed.

The text printed in this edition was drawn up by the General Secretariat of the Council, in whose archives the originals of the instruments concerned are deposited. It should be noted, however, that this text has no binding force. The official texts of the instruments consolidated are to be found in the following Official Journals.

HAVE AGREED AS FOLLOWS:

TITLE I

The Convention shall not apply to:

1. the status or legal capacity of natural persons, rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship, wills and succession;

2. bankruptcy, proceedings relating to the winding-up of insolvent companies or other legal persons, judicial arrangements, compositions and analogous proceedings;

3. social security;

4. arbitration.

TITLE II

JURISDICTION

Section 1

General provisions

Article 2

Subject to the provisions of this Convention, persons domiciled in a Contracting State shall, whatever their nationality, be sued in the courts of that State.

Persons who are not nationals of the State in which they are domiciled shall be governed by the rules of jurisdiction applicable to nationals of that State.

Article 3

Persons domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued in the courts of another Contracting State only by virtue of the rules set out in Sections 2 to 6 of this Title.

In particular the following provisions shall not be applicable as against them:

- in Belgium: Article 15 of the civil code (Code civil - Burgerlijk Wetboek) and Article 638 of the judicial code (Code judiciaire - Gerechtelijk Wetboek),
- in Denmark: Article 246 (2) and (3) of the law on civil procedure (Lov om rettens pleje) (4),

- in France: Articles 14 and 15 of the civil code (Code civil),
- in Ireland: the rules which enable jurisdiction to be founded on the document instituting the proceedings having been served on the defendant during his temporary presence in Ireland,

(b) the presence within the United Kingdom of property belonging to the defendant; or

(c) the seizure by the plaintiff of property situated in the United Kingdom (5).

Article 4

If the defendant is not domiciled in a Contracting State, the jurisdiction of the courts of each Contracting State shall, subject to the provisions of Article 16, be determined by the law of that State.

As against such a defendant, any person domiciled in a Contracting State may, whatever his nationality, avail himself in that State of the rules of jurisdiction there in force, and in particular those specified in the second paragraph of Article 3, in the same way as the nationals of that State.

Section 2

Special jurisdiction

Article 5

A person domiciled in a Contracting State may, in another Contracting State, be sued:

1. in matters relating to a contract, in the courts for the place of performance of the obligation in question; in matters relating to individual contracts of employment, this place is that where the employee habitually carries out his work, or if the employee does not habitually carry out his work in any one country, the employer may also be sued in the courts for the place where the business which engaged the employee was or is now situated (6);

2. in matters relating to maintenance, in the courts for the place where the maintenance creditor is domiciled or habitually resident or, if the matter is ancillary to proceedings concerning the status of a person, in the court which, according to its own law, has jurisdiction to entertain those proceedings, unless that jurisdiction is based solely on the nationality of one of the parties (7);

3. in matters relating to tort, delict or quasi-delict, in the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred;

4. as regards a civil claim for damages or restitution which is based on an act giving rise to criminal proceedings, in the court seised of those proceedings, to the extent that that court has jurisdiction under its own law to entertain civil proceedings;

5. as regards a dispute arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment, in the courts for the place in which the branch, agency or other establishment is situated;

6. as settlor, trustee or beneficiary of a trust created by the operation of a statute, or by a written instrument, or created orally and evidenced in writing, in the courts of the Contracting State in which the trust is domiciled (8);

7. as regards a dispute concerning the payment of remuneration claimed in respect of the salvage of a cargo or freight, in the court under the authority of which the cargo or freight in question:

(a) has been arrested to secure such payment, or

(b) could have been so arrested, but bail or other security has been given;

provided that this provision shall apply only if it is claimed that the defendant has an interest in the cargo or freight or had such an interest at the time of salvage (9).

Article 6

A person domiciled in a Contracting State may also be sued:

1. where he is one of a number of defendants, in the courts for the place where any one of them is domiciled;

2. as a third party in an action on a warranty or guarantee or in any other third party proceedings, in the court seised of the original proceedings, unless these were instituted solely with the object of removing him from the jurisdiction of the court which would be competent in his case;

3. on a counter-claim arising from the same contract or facts on which the original claim was based, in the court in which the original claim is pending;

4. in matters relating to a contract, if the action may be combined with an action against the same defendant in matters relating to rights in rem in immovable property, in the court of the Contracting State in which the property is situated (10).

Article 6a (11)

Where by virtue of this Convention a court of a Contracting State has jurisdiction in actions relating to liability from the use or operation of a ship, that court, or any other court substituted for this purpose by the internal law of that State, shall also have jurisdiction over claims for limitation of such liability.

Section 3

Jurisdiction in matters relating to insurance

Article 7

In matters relating to insurance, jurisdiction shall be determined by this Section, without prejudice to the provisions of Articles 4 and 5 point 5.

Article 8 (12)

An insurer domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued:

1. in the courts of the State where he is domiciled, or

2. in another Contracting State, in the courts for the place where the policy-holder is domiciled, or

3. if he is a co-insurer, in the courts of a Contracting State in which proceedings are brought against the leading insurer.

An insurer who is not domiciled in a Contracting State but has a branch, agency or other establishment in one of the Contracting States shall, in disputes arising out of the operations of the branch, agency or establishment, be deemed to be domiciled in that State.

Article 9

In respect of liability insurance or insurance of immovable property, the insurer may in addition be sued in the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred. The same applies if movable and immovable property are covered by the same insurance policy and both are adversely affected by the same contingency.

Article 10

In respect of liability insurance, the insurer may also, if the law of the court permits it, be joined in proceedings which the injured party had brought against the insured.

The provisions of Articles 7, 8 and 9 shall apply to actions brought by the injured party directly against the insurer, where such direct actions are permitted.

If the law governing such direct actions provides that the policy-holder or the insured may be joined as a party to the action, the same court shall have jurisdiction over them.

Article 11

Without prejudice to the provisions of the third paragraph of Article 10, an insurer may bring proceedings only in the courts of the Contracting State in which the defendant is domiciled, irrespective of whether he is the policy-holder, the insured or a beneficiary.

The provisions of this Section shall not affect the right to bring a counterclaim in the court in which, in accordance with this Section, the original claim is pending.

Article 12 (13)

The provisions of this Section may be departed from only by an agreement on jurisdiction:

1. which is entered into after the dispute has arisen, or

2. which allows the policy-holder, the insured or a beneficiary to bring proceedings in courts other than those indicated in this Section, or

3. which is concluded between a policy-holder and an insurer, both of whom are domiciled in the same Contracting State, and which has the effect of conferring jurisdiction on the courts of that State even if the harmful event were to occur abroad, provided that such an agreement is not contrary to the law of that State, or

4. which is concluded with a policy-holder who is not domiciled in a Contracting State, except in so far as the insurance is compulsory or relates to immovable property in a Contracting State, or

5. which relates to a contract of insurance in so far as it covers one or more of the risks set out in Article 12a.

Article 12a (14)

The following are the risks referred to in point 5 of Article 12:

1. any loss of or damage to:

(a) sea-going ships, installations situated offshore or on the high seas, or aircraft, arising from perils which relate to their use for commercial purposes;

(b) goods in transit other than passengers' baggage where the transit consists of or includes carriage by such ships or aircraft;

2. any liability, other than for bodily injury to passengers or loss of or damage to their baggage:

(a) arising out of the use or operation of ships, installations or aircraft as referred to in point 1 (a) above in so far as the law of the Contracting State in which such aircraft are registered does not prohibit agreements on jurisdiction regarding insurance of such risks;

(b) for loss or damage caused by goods in transit as described in point 1 (b) above;

3. any financial loss connected with the use or operation of ships, installations or aircraft as referred to in point 1 (a) above, in particular loss of freight or charter-hire;

4. any risk or interest connected with any of those referred to in points 1 to 3 above.

Section 4 (15)

Jurisdiction over consumer contracts

Article 13

In proceedings concerning a contract concluded by a person for a purpose which can be regarded as being outside his trade or profession, hereinafter called 'the consumer`, jurisdiction shall be determined by this Section, without prejudice to the provisions of point 5 of Articles 4 and 5, if it is:

1. a contract for the sale of goods on instalment credit terms; or

2. a contract for a loan repayable by instalments, or for any other form of credit, made to finance the sale of goods; or

3. any other contract for the supply of goods or a contract for the supply of services, and

(a) in the State of the consumer's domicile the conclusion of the contract was preceded by a specific invitation addressed to him or by advertising; and

(b) the consumer took in that State the steps necessary for the conclusion of the contract.

Where a consumer enters into a contract with a party who is not domiciled in a Contracting State but has a branch, agency or other establishment in one of the Contracting States, that party shall, in disputes arising out of the operations of the branch, agency or establishment, be deemed to be domiciled in that State.

This Section shall not apply to contracts of transport.

Article 14

A consumer may bring proceedings against the other party to a contract either in the courts of the Contracting State in which that party is domiciled or in the courts of the Contracting State in which he is himself domiciled.

Proceedings may be brought against a consumer by the other party to the contract only in the courts of the Contracting State in which the consumer is domiciled.

These provisions shall not affect the right to bring a counter-claim in the court in which, in accordance with this Section, the original claim is pending.

Article 15

The provisions of this Section may be departed from only by an agreement:

1. which is entered into after the dispute has arisen; or

2. which allows the consumer to bring proceedings in courts other than those indicated in this Section; or

3. which is entered into by the consumer and the other party to the contract, both of whom are at the time of conclusion of the contract domiciled or habitually resident in the same Contracting State, and which confers jurisdiction on the courts of that State, provided that such an agreement is not contrary to the law of that State.

Section 5

Exclusive jurisdiction

Article 16

The following courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction, regardless of domicile:

1. (a) in proceedings which have as their object rights in rem in immovable property or tenancies of immovable property, the courts of the Contracting State in which the property is situated;

(b) however, in proceedings which have as their object tenancies of immovable property concluded for temporary private use for a maximum period of six consecutive months, the courts of the Contracting State in which the defendant is domiciled shall also have jurisdiction, provided that the landlord and the tenant are natural persons and are domiciled in the same Contracting State (16);

2. in proceedings which have as their object the validity of the constitution, the nullity or the dissolution of companies or other legal persons or associations of natural or legal persons, or the decisions of their organs, the courts of the Contracting State in which the company, legal person or association has its seat;

3. in proceedings which have as their object the validity of entries in public registers, the courts of the Contracting State in which the register is kept;

4. in proceedings concerned with the registration or validity of patents, trade marks, designs, or other similar rights required to be deposited or registered, the courts of the Contracting State in which the deposit or registration has been applied for, has taken place or is under the terms of an international convention deemed to have taken place;

5. in proceedings concerned with the enforcement of judgments, the courts of the Contracting State in which the judgment has been or is to be enforced.

Section 6

Prorogation of jurisdiction

Article 17 (17)

If the parties, one or more of whom is domiciled in a Contracting State, have agreed that a court or the courts of a Contracting State are to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which have arisen or which may arise in connection with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction. Such an agreement conferring jurisdiction shall be either:

(a) in writing or evidenced in writing; or

(b) in a form which accords with practices which the parties have established between themselves; or

(c) in international trade or commerce, in a form which accords with a usage of which the parties are or ought to have been aware and which in such trade or commerce is widely known to, and regularly observed by, parties to contracts of the type involved in the particular trade or commerce concerned.

Where such an agreement is concluded by parties, none of whom is domiciled in a Contracting State, the courts of other Contracting States shall have no jurisdiction over their disputes unless the court or courts chosen have declined jurisdiction.

The court or courts of a Contracting State on which a trust instrument has conferred jurisdiction shall have exclusive jurisdiction in any proceedings brought against a settler, trustee or beneficiary, if relations between these persons or their rights or obligations under the trust are involved.

Agreements or provisions of a trust instrument conferring jurisdiction shall have no legal force if they are contrary to the provisions of Articles 12 or 15, or if the courts whose jurisdiction they purport to exclude have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.

If an agreement conferring jurisdiction was concluded for the benefit of only one of the parties, that party shall retain the right to bring proceedings in any other court which has jurisdiction by virtue of this Convention.

In matters relating to individual contracts of employment an agreement conferring jurisdiction shall have legal force only if it is entered into after the dispute has arisen or if the employee invokes it to seise courts other than those for the defendant's domicile or those specified in Article 5 (1).

Article 18

Apart from jurisdiction derived from other provisions of this Convention, a court of a Contracting State before whom a defendant enters an appearance shall have jurisdiction. This rule shall not apply where appearance was entered solely to contest the jurisdiction, or where another court has exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.

Section 7

Examination as to jurisdiction and admissibility

Article 19

Where a court of a Contracting State is seised of a claim which is principally concerned with a matter over which the courts of another Contracting State have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16, it shall declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction.

Article 20

Where a defendant domiciled in one Contracting State is sued in a court of another Contracting State and does not enter an appearance, the court shall declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction unless its jurisdiction is derived from the provisions of the Convention.

The court shall stay the proceedings so long as it is not shown that the defendant has been able to receive the document instituting the proceedings or an equivalent document in sufficient time to enable him to arrange for his defence, or that all necessary steps have been taken to this end (18).

The provisions of the foregoing paragraph shall be replaced by those of Article 15 of the Hague Convention of 15 November 1965 on the service abroad of judicial and extrajudicial documents in civil or commercial matters, if the document instituting the proceedings or notice thereof had to be transmitted abroad in accordance with that Convention.

Section 8

Lis pendens - related actions

Article 21 (19)

Where proceedings involving the same cause of action and between the same parties are brought in the courts of different Contracting States, any court other than the court first seised shall of its own motion stay its proceedings until such time as the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established.

Where the jurisdiction of the court first seised is established, any court other than the court first seised shall decline jurisdiction in favour of that court.

Article 22

Where related actions are brought in the courts of different Contracting States, any court other than the court first seised may, while the actions are pending at first instance, stay its proceedings.

A court other than the court first seised may also, on the application of one of the parties, decline jurisdiction if the law of that court permits the consolidation of related actions and the court first seised has jurisdiction over both actions.

For the purposes of this Article, actions are deemed to be related where they are so closely connected that it is expedient to hear and determine them together to avoid the risk of irreconcilable judgments resulting from separate proceedings.

Article 23

Where actions come within the exclusive jurisdiction of several courts, any court other than the court first seised shall decline jurisdiction in favour of that court.

Section 9

Provisional, including protective, measures

Article 24

Application may be made to the courts of a Contracting State for such provisional, including protective, measures as may be available under the law of that State, even if, under this Convention, the courts of another Contracting State have jurisdiction as to the substance of the matter.

TITLE III

RECOGNITION AND ENFORCEMENT

Article 25

For the purposes of this Convention, 'judgment` means any judgment given by a court or tribunal of a Contracting State, whatever the judgment may be called, including a decree, order, decision or writ of execution, as well as the determination of costs or expenses by an officer of the court.

Section 1

Recognition

Article 26

A judgment given in a Contracting State shall be recognized in the other Contracting States without any special procedure being required.

Any interested party who raises the recognition of a judgment as the principal issue in a dispute may, in accordance with the procedures provided for in Sections 2 and 3 of this Title, apply for a decision that the judgment be recognized.

If the outcome of proceedings in a court of a Contracting State depends on the determination of an incidental question of recognition that court shall have jurisdiction over that question.

Article 27

A judgment shall not be recognized:

1. if such recognition is contrary to public policy in the State in which recognition is sought;

2. where it was given in default of appearance, if the defendant was not duly served with the document which instituted the proceedings or with an equivalent document in sufficient time to enable him to arrange for his defence (20);

3. if the judgment is irreconcilable with a judgment given in a dispute between the same parties in the State in which recognition is sought;

4. if the court of the State of origin, in order to arrive at its judgment, has decided a preliminary question concerning the status or legal capacity of natural persons, rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship, wills or succession in a way that conflicts with a rule of the private international law of the State in which the recognition is sought, unless the same result would have been reached by the application of the rules of private international law of that State (21);

5. if the judgment is irreconcilable with an earlier judgment given in a non-contracting State involving the same cause of action and between the same parties, provided that this latter judgment fulfils the conditions necessary for its recognition in the State addressed (22).

Article 28

Moreover, a judgment shall not be recognized if it conflicts with the provisions of Sections 3, 4 or 5 of Title II, or in a case provided for in Article 59.

In its examination of the grounds of jurisdiction referred to in the foregoing paragraph, the court or authority applied to shall be bound by the findings of fact on which the court of the State of origin based its jurisdiction (23).

Subject to the provisions of the first paragraph, the jurisdiction of the court of the State of origin may not be reviewed; the test of public policy referred to in point 1 of Article 27 may not be applied to the rules relating to jurisdiction (24).

Article 29

Under no circumstances may a foreign judgment be reviewed as to its substance.

Article 30

A court of a Contracting State in which recognition is sought of a judgment given in another Contracting State may stay the proceedings if an ordinary appeal against the judgment has been lodged.

A court of a Contracting State in which recognition is sought of a judgment given in Ireland or the United Kingdom may stay the proceedings if enforcement is suspended in the State of origin, by reason of an appeal (25).

Section 2

Enforcement

Article 31

A judgment given in a Contracting State and enforceable in that State shall be enforced in another Contracting State when, on the application of any interested party, it has been declared enforceable there (26).

However, in the United Kingdom, such a judgment shall be enforced in England and Wales, in Scotland, or in Northern Ireland when, on the application of any interested party, it has been registered for enforcement in that part of the United Kingdom (27).

Article 32

(c) in Northern Ireland, to the High Court of Justice, or in the case of a maintenance judgment to the Magistrates' Court on transmission by the Secretary of State (29).

2. The jurisdiction of local courts shall be determined by reference to the place of domicile of the party against whom enforcement is sought. If he is not domiciled in the State in which enforcement is sought, it shall be determined by reference to the place of enforcement.

Article 33

The procedure for making the application shall be governed by the law of the State in which enforcement is sought.

The applicant must give an address for service of process within the area of jurisdiction of the court applied to. However, if the law of the State in which enforcement is sought does not provide for the furnishing of such an address, the applicant shall appoint a representative ad litem.

The documents referred to in Articles 46 and 47 shall be attached to the application.

Article 34

The court applied to shall give its decision without delay; the party against whom enforcement is sought shall not at this stage of the proceedings be entitled to make any submissions on the application.

The application may be refused only for one of the reasons specified in Articles 27 and 28.

Under no circumstances may the foreign judgment be reviewed as to its substance.

Article 35

The appropriate officer of the court shall without delay bring the decision given on the application to the notice of the applicant in accordance with the procedure laid down by the law of the State in which enforcement is sought.

Article 36

If enforcement is authorized, the party against whom enforcement is sought may appeal against the decision within one month of service thereof.

If that party is domiciled in a Contracting State other than that in which the decision authorizing enforcement was given, the time for appealing shall be two months and shall run from the date of service, either on him in person or at his residence. No extension of time may be granted on account of distance.

Article 37 (30)

- in Finland, by an appeal to 'korkein oikeus/högsta domstolen`,
- in Sweden by an appeal to 'Högsta domstolen`,
- in the United Kingdom, by a single further appeal on a point of law.

Article 38

The court with which the appeal under Article 37 (1) is lodged may, on the application of the appellant, stay the proceedings if an ordinary appeal has been lodged against the judgment in the State of origin or if the time for such an appeal has not yet expired; in the latter case, the court may specify the time within which such an appeal is to be lodged (31).

Where the judgment was given in Ireland or the United Kingdom, any form of appeal available in the State of origin shall be treated as an ordinary appeal for the purposes of the first paragraph (32).

The court may also make enforcement conditional on the provision of such security as it shall determine.

Article 39

During the time specified for an appeal pursuant to Article 36 and until any such appeal has been determined, no measures of enforcement may be taken other than protective measures taken against the property of the party against whom enforcement is sought.

The decision authorizing enforcement shall carry with it the power to proceed to any such protective measures.

Article 40

If the application for enforcement is refused, the applicant may appeal:

- in Belgium, to the 'cour d'appel` or 'hof van beroep`,
- in Denmark, to the 'landsret`,

(b) in Scotland, to the Court of Session, or in the case of a maintenance judgment to the Sheriff Court;

(c) in Northern Ireland, to the High Court of Justice, or in the case of a maintenance judgment to the Magistrates' Court (33).

2. The party against whom enforcement is sought shall be summoned to appear before the appellate court. If he fails to appear, the provisions of the second and third paragraphs of Article 20 shall apply even where he is not domiciled in any of the Contracting States.

Article 41 (34)

A judgment given on an appeal provided for in Article 40 may be contested only:

- in Belgium, Greece, Spain, France, Italy, Luxembourg and in the Netherlands, by an appeal in cassation,

Article 42

Where a foreign judgment has been given in respect of several matters and enforcement cannot be authorized for all of them, the court shall authorize enforcement for one or more of them.

An applicant may request partial enforcement of a judgment.

Article 43

A foreign judgment which orders a periodic payment by way of a penalty shall be enforceable in the State in which enforcement is sought only if the amount of the payment has been finally determined by the courts of the State of origin (35).

Article 44 (36)

An applicant who, in the State of origin has benefited from complete or partial legal aid or exemption from costs or expenses, shall be entitled, in the procedures provided for in Articles 32 to 35, to benefit from the most favourable legal aid or the most extensive exemption from costs or expenses provided for by the law of the State addressed.

However, an applicant who requests the enforcement of a decision given by an administrative authority in Denmark in respect of a maintenance order may, in the State addressed, claim the benefits referred to in the first paragraph if he presents a statement from the Danish Ministry of Justice to the effect that he fulfils the economic requirements to qualify for the grant of complete or partial legal aid or exemption from costs or expenses.

Article 45

No security, bond or deposit, however described, shall be required of a party who in one Contracting State applies for enforcement of a judgment given in another Contracting State on the ground that he is a foreign national or that he is not domiciled or resident in the State in which enforcement is sought.

Section 3

Common provisions

Article 46

A party seeking recognition or applying for enforcement of a judgment shall produce:

1. a copy of the judgment which satisfies the conditions necessary to establish its authenticity;

2. in the case of a judgment given in default, the original or a certified true copy of the document which establishes that the party in default was served with the document instituting the proceedings or with an equivalent document (37).

Article 47 (38)

A party applying for enforcement shall also produce:

1. documents which establish that, according to the law of the State of origin the judgment is enforceable and has been served;

2. where appropriate, a document showing that the applicant is in receipt of legal aid in the State of origin.

Article 48

If the documents specified in point 2 of Articles 46 and 47 are not produced, the court may specify a time for their production, accept equivalent documents or, if it considers that it has sufficient information before it, dispense with their production.

If the court so requires, a translation of the documents shall be produced; the translation shall be certified by a person qualified to do so in one of the Contracting States.

Article 49

No legalization or other similar formality shall be required in respect of the documents referred to in Articles 46 or 47 or the second paragraph of Article 48, or in respect of a document appointing a representative ad litem.

TITLE IV

AUTHENTIC INSTRUMENTS AND COURT SETTLEMENTS

Article 50

A document which has been formally drawn up or registered as an authentic instrument and is enforceable in one Contracting State shall, in another Contracting State, be declared enforceable there, on application made in accordance with the procedures provided for in Article 31 et seq. The application may be refused only if enforcement of the instrument is contrary to public policy in the State addressed (39).

The instrument produced must satisfy the conditions necessary to establish its authenticity in the State of origin.

The provisions of Section 3 of Title III shall apply as appropriate.

Article 51

A settlement which has been approved by a court in the course of proceedings and is enforceable in the State in which it was concluded shall be enforceable in the State addressed under the same conditions as authentic instruments (40).

TITLE V

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 52

In order to determine whether a party is domiciled in the Contracting State whose courts are seised of a matter, the Court shall apply its internal law.

If a party is not domiciled in the State whose courts are seised of the matter, then, in order to determine whether the party is domiciled in another Contracting State, the court shall apply the law of that State.

. . . (41).

Article 53

For the purposes of this Convention, the seat of a company or other legal person or association of natural or legal persons shall be treated as its domicile. However, in order to determine that seat, the court shall apply its rules of private international law.

In order to determine whether a trust is domiciled in the Contracting State whose courts are seised of the matter, the court shall apply its rules of private international law (42).

TITLE VI

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

Article 54 (43)

The provisions of the Convention shall apply only to legal proceedings instituted and to documents formally drawn up or registered as authentic instruments after its entry into force in the State of origin and, where recognition or enforcement of a judgment or authentic instruments is sought, in the State addressed.

However, judgments given after the date of entry into force of this Convention between the State of origin and the State addressed in proceedings instituted before that date shall be recognized and enforced in accordance with the provisions of Title III if jurisdiction was founded upon rules which accorded with those provided for either in Title II of this Convention or in a convention concluded between the State of origin and the State addressed which was in force when the proceedings were instituted (44).

If the parties to a dispute concerning a contract had agreed in writing before 1 June 1988 for Ireland or before 1 January 1987 for the United Kingdom that the contract was to be governed by the law of Ireland or of a part of the United Kingdom, the courts of Ireland or of that part of the United Kingdom shall retain the right to exercise jurisdiction in the dispute (45).

Article 54a (46)

For a period of three years from 1 November 1986 for Denmark and from 1 June 1988 for Ireland, jurisdiction in maritime matters shall be determined in these States not only in accordance with the provisions of Title II, but also in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 1 to 6 following. However, upon the entry into force of the International Convention relating to the arrest of sea-going ships, signed at Brussels on 10 May 1952, for one of these States, those provisions shall cease to have effect for that State.

1. A person who is domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued in the courts of one of the States mentioned above in respect of a maritime claim if the ship to which the claim relates or any other ship owned by him has been arrested by judicial process within the territory of the latter State to secure the claim, or could have been so arrested there but bail or other security has been given, and either:

(a) the claimant is domiciled in the latter State; or

(b) the claim arose in the latter State; or

(c) the claim concerns the voyage during which the arrest was made or could have been made; or

(d) the claim arises out of a collision or out of damage caused by a ship to another ship or to goods or persons on board either ship, either by the execution or non-execution of a manoeuvre or by the non-observance of regulations; or

(e) the claim is for salvage; or

(f) the claim is in respect of a mortgage or hypothecation of the ship arrested.

2. A claimant may arrest either the particular ship to which the maritime claim relates, or any other ship which is owned by the person who was, at the time when the maritime claim arose, the owner of the particular ship. However, only the particular ship to which the maritime claim relates may be arrested in respect of the maritime claims set out in 5 (o), (p) or (q) of this Article.

3. Ships shall be deemed to be in the same ownership when all the shares therein are owned by the same person or persons.

4. When in the case of a charter by demise of a ship the charterer alone is liable in respect of a maritime claim relating to that ship, the claimant may arrest that ship or any other ship owned by the charterer, but no other ship owned by the owner may be arrested in respect of such claim. The same shall apply to any case in which a person other than the owner of a ship is liable in respect of a maritime claim relating to that ship.

5. The expression 'maritime claim` means a claim arising out of one or more of the following:

(a) damage caused by any ship either in collision or otherwise;

(b) loss of life or personal injury caused by any ship or occurring in connection with the operation on any ship;

(c) salvage;

(d) agreement relating to the use or hire of any ship whether by charterparty or otherwise;

(e) agreement relating to the carriage of goods in any ship whether by charterparty or otherwise;

(f) loss of or damage to goods including baggage carried in any ship;

(g) general average;

(h) bottomry;

(i) towage;

(j) pilotage;

(k) goods or materials wherever supplied to a ship for her operation or maintenance;

(l) construction, repair or equipment of any ship or dock charges and dues;

(m) wages of masters, officers or crew;

(n) mater's disbursements, including disbursements made by shippers, charterers or agents on behalf of a ship or her owner;

(o) dispute as to the title to or ownership of any ship;

(p) disputes between co-owners of any ship as to the ownership, possession, employment or earnings of that ship;

(q) the mortgage or hypothecation of any ship.

6. In Denmark, the expression 'arrest` shall be deemed as regards the maritime claims referred to in 5 (o) and (p) of this Article, to include a 'forbud`, where that is the only procedure allowed in respect of such a claim under Articles 646 to 653 of the law on civil procedure (lov om rettens pleje).

TITLE VII

Article 56

The Treaty and the conventions referred to in Article 55 shall continue to have effect in relation to matters to which this Convention does not apply.

They shall continue to have effect in respect of judgments given and documents formally drawn up or registered as authentic instruments before the entry into force of this Convention.

Article 57

1. This Convention shall not affect any conventions to which the Contracting States are or will be parties and which in relation to particular matters, govern jurisdiction or the recognition or enforcement of judgments (55).

2. With a view to its uniform interpretation, paragraph 1 shall be applied in the following manner:

(a) this Convention shall not prevent a court of a Contracting State which is a party to a convention on a particular matter from assuming jurisdiction in accordance with that Convention, even where the defendant is domiciled in another Contracting State which is not a party to that Convention.

The court hearing the action shall, in any event, apply Article 20 of this Convention;

In any event, the provisions of this Convention which concern the procedure for recognition and enforcement of judgments may be applied (56).

3. This Convention shall not affect the application of provisions which, in relation to particular matters, govern jurisdiction or the recognition or enforcement of judgments and which are or will be contained in acts of the institutions of the European Communities or in national laws harmonized in implementation of such acts (57).

Until such time as the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, signed at Lugano on 16 September 1988, takes effect with regard to France and the Swiss Confederation, this Convention shall not affect the rights granted to Swiss nationals by the Convention between France and the Swiss Confederation on jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments in civil matters, signed at Paris on 15 June 1869.

Article 59

This Convention shall not prevent a Contracting State from assuming, in a convention on the recognition and enforcement of judgments, an obligation towards a third State not to recognize judgments given in other Contracting States against defendants domiciled or habitually resident in the third State where, in cases provided for in Article 4, the judgment could only be founded on a ground of jurisdiction specified in the second paragraph of Article 3.

However, a Contracting State may not assume an obligation towards a third State not to recognize a judgment given in another Contracting State by a court basing its jurisdiction on the presence within that State of property belonging to the defendant, or the seizure by the plaintiff of property situated there:

1. if the action is brought to assert or declare proprietary or possessory rights in that property, seeks to obtain authority to dispose of it, or arises from another issue relating to such property; or

2. if the property constitutes the security for a debt which is the subject-matter of the action (59).

The High Contracting Parties have agreed upon the following provisions, which shall be annexed to the Convention:

Article I

Any person domiciled in Luxembourg who is sued in a court of another Contracting State pursuant to Article 5 (1) may refuse to submit to the jurisdiction of that court. If the defendant does not enter an appearance the court shall declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction.

An agreement conferring jurisdiction, within the meaning of Article 17, shall be valid with respect to a person domiciled in Luxembourg only if that person has expressly and specifically so agreed.

Article II

Without prejudice to any more favourable provisions of national laws, persons domiciled in a Contracting State who are being prosecuted in the criminal courts of another Contracting State of which they are not nationals for an offence which was not intentionally committed may be defended by persons qualified to do so, even if they do not appear in person.

However, the court seised of the matter may order appearance in person; in the case of failure to appear, a judgment given in the civil action without the person concerned having had the opportunity to arrange for his defence need not be recognized or enforced in the other Contracting States.

Article III

In proceedings for the issue of an order for enforcement, no charge, duty or fee calculated by reference to the value of the matter in issue may be levied in the State in which enforcement is sought.

Article IV

Judicial and extrajudicial documents drawn up in one Contracting State which have to be served on persons in another Contracting State shall be transmitted in accordance with the procedures laid down in the conventions and agreements concluded between the Contracting States.

Unless the State in which service is to take place objects by declaration to the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities, such documents may also be sent by the appropriate public officers of the State in which the document has been drawn up directly to the appropriate public officers of the State in which the addressee is to be found. In this case the officer of the State of origin shall send a copy of the document to the officer of the State applied to who is competent to forward it to the addressee. The document shall be forwarded in the manner specified by the law of the State applied to. The forwarding shall be recorded by a certificate sent directly to the officer of the State of origin.

Article V (69)

The jurisdiction specified in Articles 6 (2) and 10 in actions on a warranty or guarantee or in any other third-party proceedings may not be resorted to in the Federal Republic of Germany or in Austria. Any person domiciled in another Contracting State may be sued in the courts:

- of the Federal Republic of Germany, pursuant to Articles 68, 72, 73 and 74 of the code of civil procedure (Zivilprozessordnung) concerning third-party notices,
- of Austria, pursuant to Article 21 of the code of civil procedure (Zivilprozessordnung) concerning third-party notices.

Judgments given in the other Contracting States by virtue of Article 6 (2) or 10 shall be recognized and enforced in the Federal Republic of Germany and in Austria in accordance with Title III. Any effects which judgments given in those States may have on third parties by application of the provisions in the preceeding paragraph shall also be recognized in the other Contracting States.

In matters relating to maintenance, the expression 'court` includes the Danish administrative authorities.

In Sweden, in summary proceedings concerning orders to pay (betalningsföreläggande) and assistance (bandräckning), the expression 'court` includes the 'Swedish enforcement service` (kronofogdemyndighet).

Article Vb (71)

In proceedings involving a dispute between the master and a member of the crew of a sea-going ship registered in Denmark, in Greece, in Ireland or in Portugal, concerning remuneration or other conditions of service, a court in a Contracting State shall establish whether the diplomatic or consular officer responsible for the ship has been notified of the dispute. It shall stay the proceedings so long as he has not been notified. It shall of its own motion decline jurisdiction if the officer, having been duly notified, has exercised the powers accorded to him in the matter by a consular convention, or in the absence of such a convention has, within the time allowed, raised any objection to the exercise of such jurisdiction.

Article Vc (72)

Article 52 and 53 of this Convention shall, when applied by Article 69 (5) of the Convention for the European patent for the common market, signed at Luxembourg on 15 December 1975, to the provisions relating to 'residence` in the English text of that Convention, operate as if 'residence` in that text were the same as 'domicile` in Articles 52 and 53.

Article Vd (73)

Without prejudice to the jurisdiction of the European Patent Office under the Convention on the grant of European patents, signed at Munich on 5 October 1973, the courts of each Contracting State shall have exclusive jurisdiction, regardless of domicile, in proceedings concerned with the registration or validity of any European patent granted for that State which is not a Community patent by virtue of the provisions of Article 86 of the Convention for the European patent for the common market, signed at Luxembourg on 15 December 1975.

COUNCIL

Report on the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters

(Signed at Brussels, 27 September 1968)

by Mr P. Jenard

Director in the Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and External Trade.

A committee of experts set up in 1960 by decision of the Committee of Permanent Representatives of the Member States, following a proposal by the Commission, prepared a draft Convention, in pursuance of Article 220 of the EEC Treaty, on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters. The committee was composed of governmental experts from the six Member States, representatives of the Commission, and observers. Its rapporteur, Mr P. Jenard, Directeur d'Administration in the Belgian Ministry for Foreign Affairs and External Trade, wrote the explanatory report, which was submitted to the governments at the same time as the draft prepared by the committee of experts. The following is the text of that report. It takes the form of a commentary on the Convention, which was signed in Brussels on 27 September 1968.

CONTENTS

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

By Article 220 of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community, the Member States agreed to enter into negotiations with each other, so far as necessary, with a view to securing for the benefit of their nationals the simplification of formalities governing the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments of courts or tribunals and of arbitration awards.

The fact that the Treaty of Rome requires the Member States to resolve this problem shows that it is important. In a note sent to the Member States on 22 October 1959 inviting them to commence negotiations, the Commission of the European Economic Community pointed out that

> 'a true internal market between the six States will be achieved only if adequate legal protection can be secured. The economic life of the Community may be subject to disturbances and difficulties unless it is possible, where necessary by judicial means, to ensure the recognition and enforcement of the various rights arising from the existence of a multiplicity of legal relationships. As jurisdiction in both civil and commercial matters is derived from the sovereignty of Member States, and since the effect of judicial acts is confined to each national territory, legal protection and, hence, legal certainty in the common market are essentially dependent on the adoption by the Member States of a satisfactory solution to the problem of recognition and enforcement of judgments.'

On receiving this note the Committee of Permanent Representatives decided on 18 February 1960 to set up a committee of experts. The committee, consisting of delegates from the six Member countries, observers from the Benelux Committee on the unification of law and from the Hague Conference on private international law, and representatives from the EEC Commission departments concerned, met for the first time from 11 to 13 July 1960 and appointed as its chairman Professor Bülow then Ministerialdirigent and later Staatssekretär in the Federal Ministry of Justice in Bonn, and as its rapporteur Mr Jenard, directeur in the Belgian Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

At its 15th meeting, held in Brussels from 7 to 11 December 1964, the committee adopted a 'Preliminary Draft Convention on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, and the enforcement of authentic instruments (document 14371/IV/64). This preliminary draft, with an explanatory report (document 2449/IV/65), was submitted to the Governments for comment.

The comments of the Governments, and those submitted by the Union of the Industries of the European Community, the Permanent Conference of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the EEC, the Banking Federation of the EEC, the Consultative Committee of the Barristers' and Lawyers' Associations of the six EEC countries (a committee of the International Association of Lawyers), were studied by the Committee at its meeting of 5 to 15 July 1966. The draft Convention was finally adopted by the experts at that meeting.

The names of the governmental experts who took part in the work of the committee are set out in the annex to this report.

CHAPTER II

BACKGROUND TO THE CONVENTION

It is helpful to consider, first, the rules in each of the six countries governing the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments.

A. THE LAW IN FORCE IN THE SIX STATES

In Belgium, until the entry into force of the Judicial Code (Code Judiciaire), the relevant provisions as regards enforcement are to be found in Article 10 of the Law of 25 March 1876, which contains Title I of the Introductory Book of the Code of Civil Procedure (1).

Where there is no reciprocal convention, a court seised of an application for an order for enforcement 'has jurisdiction over a foreign judgment as to both form and substance, and can re-examine both the facts and the law. In other words, it has power to review the matter fully'. (2) (3)

(1) Article 10 of the Law of 1876 provides that: They (courts of first instance) shall also have jurisdiction in relation to judgments given by foreign courts in civil and commercial matters. Where there exists a treaty concluded on a basis of reciprocity between Belgium and the country in which the judgment was given, they shall review only the following five points:

1. whether the judgment contains anything contrary to public policy or to the principles of Belgian public law;
2. whether, under the law of the country in which the judgment was given, it has become res judicata;
3. whether, under that law, the certified copy of the judgment satisfies the conditions necessary to establish its authenticity;
4. whether the rights of the defendant have been observed;
5. whether the jurisdiction of the foreign court is based solely on the nationality of the plaintiff.

Article 570 of the Judicial Code contained in the Law of 10 October 1967 (supplement to the Moniteur belge of 31 October 1967) reads as follows:

'Courts of first instance shall adjudicate on applications for orders for the enforcement of judgments given by foreign courts in civil matters, regardless of the amount involved. Except where the provisions of a treaty between Belgium and the country in which judgment was given are to be applied, the court shall examine, in addition to the substance of the matter:

1. whether the judgment contains anything contrary to public policy or to the principles of Belgian public law;
2. whether the rights of the defendant have been observed;
3. whether the jurisdiction of the foreign court is based solely on the nationality of the plaintiff;
4. whether, under the law of the country in which the judgment was given, it has become res judicata;
5. whether, under that law, the certified copy of the judgment satisfies the conditions necessary to establish its authenticity.' These provisions will enter into force on 31 October 1970 at the latest. Before that date an arrêté royal (Royal Decree) will determine the date on which the provisions of the Judicial Code enter into force.

(3) RIGAUX, L'efficacité des jugements étrangers en Belgique, Journal des tribunaux, 10. 4. 1960, p 287.

As regards recognition, text-book authorities and case-law draw a distinction between foreign judgments relating to status and legal capacity and those relating to other matters. The position at present is that foreign judgments not relating to the status and legal capacity of persons are not regarded by the courts as having the force of res judicata.

However, foreign judgments relating to a person's status or legal capacity may be taken as evidence of the status acquired by that person (4). Such a foreign judgment thus acts as a bar to any new proceedings for divorce or separation filed before a Belgian court if the five conditions listed in Article 10 of the Law of 1876 are fulfilled, as they 'constitute no more than the application to foreign judgments of rules which the legislature considers essential for any judgment to be valid'.

In the Federal Republic of Germany, foreign judgments are recognized and enforced on the basis of reciprocity (5). The conditions for recognition of foreign judgments are laid down in paragraph 328 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Zivilprozeßordnung):

'I. A judgment given by a foreign court may not be recognized:

1. where the courts of the State to which the foreign court belongs have no jurisdiction under German law;

2. where the unsuccessful defendant is German and has not entered an appearance, if the document instituting the proceedings was not served on him in person either in the State to which the court belongs, or by a German authority under the system of mutual assistance in judicial matters;

3. where, to the detriment of the German party, the judgment has not complied with the provisions of Article 13 (1) and (3) or of Articles 17, 18, and 22 of the Introductory Law to the Civil Code (Einführungsgesetz zum Bürgerlichen Gesetzbuch), or with the provisions of Article 27 of that Law which refer to Article 13 (1), nor where, in matters falling within the scope of Article 12 (3) of the Law of 4 July 1939 on disappearances, certifications of death, and establishment of the date of decease (RGBl. I, p. 1186), there has been a failure to comply with the provisions of Article 13 (2) of the Introductory Law to the Civil Code, to the detriment of the wife of a foreigner who has been declared dead by judgment of the court (1);

4. where recognition of the judgment would be contrary to 'good morals' (gegen die guten Sitten) or the objectives of a German law;

5. where there is no guarantee of reciprocity.

II. The provision in (5) above shall not prevent recognition of a judgment given in a matter not relating to property rights where no court in Germany has jurisdiction under German law.'

The procedure for recognizing judgments delivered in actions relating to matrimonial matters is governed by a special Law (Familienrechtsänderungsgesetz) of 11 August 1961 (BGBl. I, p. 1221, Article 7).

Enforcement is governed by Articles 722 and 723 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which read as follows:

Article 722

'I. A foreign judgment may be enforced only where this is authorized by virtue of an order for enforcement.

II. An application for an order for enforcement shall be heard either by the Amtsgericht or the Landgericht having general jurisdiction in relation to the defendant, or otherwise by the Amtsgericht or the Landgericht before which the defendant may be summoned under Article 23.'

Article 723

'I. An order for enforcement shall be granted without re-examination of the substance of the judgment.

II. An order for enforcement shall be granted only if the foreign judgment has become res judicata under the law of the court in which it was given. No order for enforcement shall be granted where recognition of the judgment is excluded by Article 328.'

In France, Article 546 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Code de procédure civile) provides that judgments given by foreign courts and instruments recorded by foreign officials can be enforced only after being declared enforceable by a French court (Articles 2123 and 2128 of the Civil Code).

The courts have held that four conditions must be satisfied for an order for enforcement to be granted: the foreign court must have had jurisdiction; the procedure followed must have been in order; the law applied must have been that which is applicable under the French system of conflict of laws; and due regard must have been paid to public policy (2).

The Cour de cassation recently held (Cass. civ. 1er Section, 7 January 1964 — Munzer case) that the substance of the original action could not be reviewed by the court hearing the application for an order for enforcement. This judgment has since been followed.

In Italy, on the other hand, the Code of Civil Procedure (Codice di procedura civile) in principle allows foreign judgments to be recognized and enforced.

Under Article 796 of the Code of Civil Procedure, any foreign judgment may be declared enforceable in Italy by the Court of Appeal (Corte d'appello) for the place in which enforcement is to take place (Dichiarazione di efficacia).

Under Article 797 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the Court of Appeal examines whether the foreign judgment was given by a judicial authority having jurisdiction under the rules in force in Italy; whether in the proceedings abroad the document instituting the proceedings was properly served and whether sufficient notice was given; whether the parties properly entered an appearance in the proceedings or whether their default was duly recognized; whether the judgment has become res judicata; whether the judgment conflicts with a judgment given by an Italian judicial authority; whether proceedings between the same parties and concerning the same claim are pending before an Italian judicial authority; and whether the judgment contains anything contrary to Italian public policy.

However, if the defendant failed to appear in the foreign proceedings, he may request the Italian court to review the substance of the case (Article 798). In such a case, the Court may either order enforcement, or hear the substance of the case and give judgment.

(1) These Articles of the Introductory Law to the Civil Code provide for the application of German law in many cases: condition of validity of marriage, form of marriage, divorce, legitimate and illegitimate paternity, adoption, certification of death.

(2) Batiffol, Traité élémentaire de droit international privé, No 741 et seq.

There is also in Italian law the 'delibazione incidentale' (Article 799 of the Code of Civil Procedure) which, however, applies only to proceedings in which it is sought to invoke a foreign judgment.

Luxembourg. Under Article 546 of the Luxembourg Code of Civil Procedure (Code de procédure civile), judgments given by foreign courts and instruments recorded by foreign officials can be enforced in the Grand Duchy only after being declared enforceable by a Luxembourg court (see Articles 2123 and 2128 of the Civil Code).

Luxembourg law requires seven conditions to be satisfied before an order for enforcement can be granted: the judgment must be enforceable in the country in which it was given; the foreign court must have had jurisdiction; the law applied must have been that applicable under the Luxembourg rules of conflict of laws; the rules of procedure of the foreign law must have been observed; the rights of the defendant must have been observed; due regard must have been paid to public policy; the law must not have been contravened (Luxembourg, 5. 2. 64, Pasicrisie luxembourgeoise XIX, 285).

Luxembourg law no longer permits any review of a foreign judgment as to the merits.

In the Netherlands, the Code of Civil Procedure (Wetboek van Burgerlijke Rechtsvordering) lays down the principle that judgments of foreign courts are not enforceable in the Kingdom. Matters settled by foreign courts may be reconsidered by Netherlands courts (see Article 431 of the Code of Civil Procedure).

The national laws of the Member States thus vary considerably.

B. EXISTING CONVENTIONS

Apart from conventions dealing with particular matters (see p. 10), various conventions on enforcement exist between the Six; they are listed in Article 55 of the Convention. However, relations between France and the Federal Republic of Germany, France and the Netherlands, France and Luxembourg, Germany and Luxembourg, and Luxembourg and Italy are hampered by the absence of such conventions (1).

There are also striking differences between the various conventions. Some, like those between France and Belgium, and between Belgium and the Netherlands, and the Benelux Treaty, are based on 'direct' jurisdiction; but all the others are based on 'indirect' jurisdiction. The Convention between France and Italy is based on indirect jurisdiction, but nevertheless contains some rules of direct jurisdiction. Some conventions allow only those judgments which have becom res judicata to be recognized and enforced, whilst others such as the Benelux Treaty and the Conventions between Belgium and the Netherlands, Germany and Belgium, Italy and Belgium and Germany and the Netherlands apply to judgments which are capable of enforcement (2). Some cover judgments given in civil matters by criminal courts, whilst others are silent on this point or expressly exclude such judgments from their scope (Conventions between Italy and the Netherlands, Article 10, and between Germany and Italy, Article 12).

There are various other differences between these treaties and conventions which need not be discussed in detail; they relate in particular to the determination of competent courts and to the conditions governing recognition and enforcement. It should moreover be stressed that these conventions either do not lay down the enforcement procedure or give only a summary outline of it.

The present unsatisfactory state of affairs as regards the recognition and enforcement of judgments could have been improved by the conclusion of new bilateral conventions between Member States not yet bound by such conventions.

(1) It should be noted that at the time of writing this report, the Benelux Treaty has not yet entered into force and there is no agreement existing between Luxembourg on the one hand and Belgium and the Netherlands on the other.

(2) The Franco-Belgian convention, in spite of the provisions of Article 11 (2) which impose the condition of res judicata, nevertheless applies to enforceable judgments even if there is still a right of appeal (see Niboyet, Droit international privé français, T. VII 2022).

However, the Committee has decided in favour of the conclusion of a multilateral convention between the countries of the European Economic Community, in accordance with the views expressed in the Commission's letter of 22 October 1959. The Committee felt that the differences between the bilateral conventions would hinder the 'free movement' of judgments and lead to unequal treatment of the various nationals of the Member States, such inequality being contrary to the fundamental EEC principle of non-discrimination, set out, in particular, in Article 7 of the Treaty of Rome.

In addition, the European Economic Community provided the conditions necessary for a modern, liberal law on the recognition and enforcement of judgments, which would satisfy both legal and commercial interests.

C. THE NATURE OF THE CONVENTION

Some of the bilateral conventions concluded between the Member States, such as the Convention between France and Belgium of 8 July 1899, the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands of 28 March 1925, and the Benelux Treaty of 24 November 1961, are based on rules of direct jurisdiction, whilst in the others the rules of jurisdiction are indirect. Under conventions of the first type, known also as 'double treaties', the rules of jurisdiction laid down are applicable in the State of origin, i.e. the State in which the proceedings originally took place; they therefore apply independently of any proceedings for recognition and enforcement, and permit a defendant who is summoned before a court which under the convention in question would not have jurisdiction to refuse to accept its jurisdiction.

Rules of jurisdiction in a convention are said to be 'indirect' when they do not affect the courts of the State in which the judgment was originally given, and are to be considered only in relation to recognition and enforcement. They apply only in determining cases in which the court of the State in which recognition or enforcement of a judgment is sought (the State addressed) is obliged to recognize the jurisdiction of the court of the State of origin. They can therefore be taken as conditions governing the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments and, more specifically, governing supervision of the jurisdiction of foreign courts.

The Committee spent a long time considering which of these types of convention the EEC should have. It eventually decided in favour of a new system based on direct jurisdiction but differing in several respects from existing bilateral conventions of that type.

Although the Committee of experts did not underestimate the value and importance of 'single' conventions, (i. e. conventions based on rules of indirect jurisdiction) it felt that within the EEC a convention based on rules of direct jurisdiction as a result of the adoption of common rules of jurisdiction would allow increased harmonization of laws, provide greater legal certainty, avoid discrimination and facilitate the 'free movement' of judgments, which is after all the ultimate objective.

Conventions based on direct jurisdiction lay down common rules of jursidiction, thus bringing about the harmonization of laws, whereas under those based on indirect jurisdiction, national provisions apply, without restriction, in determining international jurisdiction in each State.

Legal certainty is most effectively secured by conventions based on direct jurisdiction since, under them, judgments are given by courts deriving their jurisdiction from the conventions themselves; however, in the case of conventions based on indirect jurisdiction, certain judgments cannot be recognized and enforced abroad unless national rules of jurisdiction coincide with the rules of the convention (1).

Moreover, since it establishes, on the basis of mutual agreement, an autonomous system of international jurisdiction in relations between the Member States, the Convention makes it easier to abandon certain rules of jurisdiction which are generally regarded as exorbitant.

Finally, by setting out rules of jurisdiction which may be relied upon as soon as proceedings are begun in the State of origin, the Convention regulates the problem of lis pendens and also helps to minimize the conditions governing recognition and enforcement.

(1) WESER, Les conflits de juridictions dans le cadre du Marché Commun, Revue Critique de droit international privé 1960, pp. 161-172.

As already stated, the Convention is based on direct jurisdiction, but differs fundamentally from treaties and conventions of the same type previously concluded. This is not the place to undertake a detailed study of the differences, or to justify them; it will suffice merely to list them:

1. the criterion of domicile replaces that of nationality;
2. the principle of equality of treatment is extended to any person domiciled in the Community, whatever his nationality;
3. rules of exclusive jurisdiction are precisely defined;
4. the right of the defendant to defend himself in the original proceedings is safeguarded;
5. the number of grounds for refusal of recognition and enforcement is reduced.

In addition, the Convention is original in that:

1. the procedure for obtaining enforcement is standardized;
2. rules of procedure are laid down for cases in which recognition is at issue;
3. provision is made for cases of conflict with other conventions.

CHAPTER III

SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

The scope of the Convention is determined by the preamble and Article 1.

It governs international legal relationships, applies automatically, and covers all civil and commercial matters, apart from certain exceptions which are exhaustively listed.

I. INTERNATIONAL LEGAL RELATIONSHIPS

As is stressed in the fourth paragraph of the preamble, the Convention determines the international jurisdiction of the courts of the Contracting States.

It alters the rules of jurisdiction in force in each Contracting State only where an international element is involved. It does not define this concept, since the international element in a legal relationship may depend on the particular facts of the proceedings of which the court is seised. Proceedings instituted in the courts of a Contracting State which involves only persons domiciled in that State will not normally be affected by the Convention; Article 2 simply refers matters back to the rules of jurisdiction in force in that State. It is possible, however, that an international element may be involved in proceedings of this type. This would be the case, for example, where the defendant was a foreign national, a situation in which the principle of equality of treatment laid down in the second paragraph of Article 2 would apply, or where the proceedings related to a matter over which the courts of another State had exclusive jurisdiction (Article 16), or where identical or related proceedings had been brought in the courts of another State (Article 21 to 23).

It is clear that at the recognition and enforcement stage, the Convention governs only international legal relationships, since ex hypothesi it concerns the recognition and enforcement in one Contracting State of judgments given in another Contracting State [1].

II. THE BINDING NATURE OF THE CONVENTION

It was decided by the committee of experts that the Convention should apply automatically. This principle is formally laid down in Articles 19 and 20 which deal with the matter of examination by the courts of the Contracting States of their international jurisdiction. The courts must apply the rules of the Convention whether or not they are pleaded by the parties. It follows from this, for example, that if a person domiciled in Belgium is sued in a French court on the basis of Article 14 of the French Civil Code, and contests the jurisdiction of that court but without pleading the provisions of the Convention, the court must nevertheless apply Article 3 and declare that it has no jurisdiction (1).

III. CIVIL AND COMMERCIAL MATTERS

The Committee did not specify what is meant by 'civil and commercial matters', nor did it point to a solution of the problem of classification by determining the law according to which that expression should be interpreted.

In this respect it followed the practice of existing conventions (2).

However, it follows from the text of the Convention that civil and commercial matters are to be classified as such according to their nature, and irrespective of the character of the court or tribunal which is seised of the proceedings or which has given judgment. This emerges from Article 1, which provides that the Convention shall apply in civil and commercial matters 'whatever the nature of the court or tribunal'. The Convention also applies irrespective of whether the proceedings are contentious or non-contentious. It likewise applies to labour law in so far as this is regarded as a civil or commercial matter (see also under contracts of employment, page 24).

The Convention covers civil proceedings brought before criminal courts, both as regards decisions relating to jurisdiction, and also as regards the recognition and enforcement of judgments given by criminal courts in such proceedings. It thereby takes into account certain laws in force in the majority of the Contracting States (3), tends to rule out any differences of interpretation such as have arisen in applying the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands (4) and, finally, meets current requirements arising from the increased number of road accidents.

The relevant provisions of the treaty and conventions already concluded between the Member States vary widely, as has already been pointed out in Chapter I (A).

The formula adopted by the Committee reflects the current trend in favour of inserting in conventions clauses specifying that they apply to judgments given in civil or commercial matters by criminal courts. This can in particular be seen in the Benelux Treaty of 24 November 1961 and in the work of the Hague Conference on private international law.

It should be noted that the provisions of Article 5 (4) of the Convention in no way alter the penal jurisdiction of criminal courts and tribunals as laid down in the various codes of criminal procedure.

As regards both jurisdiction and recognition and enforcement, the Convention affects only civil proceedings of which those courts are seised, and judgments given in such proceedings.

However, in order to counter the objection that a party against whom civil proceedings have been brought might be obstructed in conducting his defence if criminal sanctions could be imposed on him in the same proceedings, the Committee decided on a solution identical to that adopted in the Benelux Treaty. Article II of the Protocol provides that such persons may be defended or represented in criminal courts. Thus they will not be obliged to appear in person to defend their civil interests.

The Convention also applies to civil or commercial matters brought before administrative tribunals.

The formula adopted by the Committee is identical to that envisaged by the Commission which was given the task at the fourth session of the Hague Conference on private international law of examining the Convention of 14 November 1896 in order to draw up common rules on a number of aspects of private international law relating to civil procedure. It reported as follows:

> 'The expression "civil or commercial matters" is very wide and does not include only those matters which fall within the jurisdiction of civil tribunals and commercial tribunals in countries where administrative tribunals also exist. Otherwise there would be a wholly unjustifiable inequality between the Contracting States: service abroad of judicial instruments could take place on a wider scale for countries which do not have administrative tribunals than for countries which have them. In brief, the Convention is applicable from the moment when private interests become involved ...' (1).

Thus, for example, decisions of the French Conseil d'État given on such matters may be recognized and enforced (2).

IV. MATTERS EXCLUDED FROM THE SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

The ideal solution would certainly have been to apply the Convention to all civil and commercial matters. However, the Committee did not feel able to adopt this approach, and limited the scope of the Convention to matters relating to property rights for reasons similar to those which prevailed when the Hague Convention on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in civil and commercial matters was drafted, the main reason being the difficulties resulting from the absence of any overall solution to the problem of conflict of laws.

The disparity between rules of conflict of laws is particularly apparent in respect of matters not relating to property rights, since in general the intention of the parties cannot regulate matters independently of considerations of public policy.

The Committee, like the Hague Conference on private international law, preferred a formula which excluded certain matters to one which would have involved giving a positive definition of the scope of the Convention. The solution adopted implies that all litigation and all judgments relating to contractual or non-contractual obligations which do not involve the status or legal capacity of natural persons, wills or succession, rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship, bankruptcy or social security must fall within the scope of the Convention, and that in this respect the Convention should be interpreted as widely as possible.

However, matters falling outside the scope of the Convention do so only if they constitute the principal subject-matter of the proceedings. They are thus not excluded when they come before the court as a subsidiary matter either in the main proceedings or in preliminary proceedings (3).

A. Status, legal capacity, rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship, wills, succession

Apart from the desirability of bringing the Convention into force as soon as possible, the Committee was influenced by the following considerations. Even assuming that the Committee managed to unify the rules of jurisdiction in this field, and whatever the nature of the rules selected, there was such disparity on these matters between the various systems of law, in particular regarding the rules of conflict of laws, that it would have been difficult not to re-examine the rules of jurisdiction at the enforcement stage. This in turn would have meant changing the nature of the Convention and making it much less effective. In addition, if the Committee had agreed to withdraw from the court of enforcement all powers of examination, even in matters not relating to property rights, that court would surely have been encouraged to abuse the notion of public policy, using it to refuse recognition to foreign judgments referred to it. The members of the Committee chose the lesser of the two evils, retaining the unity and effectiveness of their draft while restricting its scope. The most serious difficulty with regard to status and legal capacity is obviously that of divorce, a problem which is complicated by the extreme divergences between the various systems of law: Italian law prohibits divorce, while Belgian law not only provides for divorce by consent (Articles 223, 275 et seq. of the Civil Code), which is unknown under the other legal systems apart from that of Luxembourg, but also, by the Law of 27 June 1960 on the admissibility of divorce when at least one of the spouses is a foreign national, incorporates provisions governing divorces by foreign nationals who ordinarily reside in Belgium.

The wording used, 'status or legal capacity of natural persons', differs slightly from that adopted in the Hague Convention, which excludes from its scope judgments concerning 'the status or capacity of persons or questions of family law, including personal or financial rights and obligations between parents and children or between spouses' (Article 1 (1)). The reason for this is twofold. Firstly, family law in the six Member States of the Community is not a concept distinct from questions of status or capacity; secondly, the EEC Convention, unlike the Hague Convention, applies to maintenance (Article 5 (2)) even where the obligation stems from the status of the persons and irrespective of whether rights and duties between spouses or between parents and children are involved.

Moreover, in order to avoid differences of interpretation, Article 1 specificies that the Convention does not apply to the status or legal capacity of natural persons, thereby constituting a further distinction between this Convention and the Hague Convention, which specifies that it does not apply to judgments dealing principally with 'the existence or constitution of legal persons or the powers of their organs' (Article 1 (2) third indent).

With regard to matters relating to succession, the Committee concurred in the opinion of the International Union of Latin Notaries.

This body, when consulted by the Committee, considered that it was necessary, and would become increasingly so as the EEC developed in the future, to facilitate the recognition and enforcement of judgments given in matters relating to succession, and that it was therefore desirable for the six Member States to conclude a convention on the subject. However, the Union considered that it was essential first to unify the rules of conflict of laws.

As is pointed out in the Memorandum of the Permanent Bureau of the Hague Conference on private international law [1], from which this commentary has been taken, there are fairly marked differences between the various States on matters of succession and of rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship.

1. As regards succession, some systems of law make provision for a portion of the estate to devolve compulsorily upon the heirs, whereas others do not. The share allocated to the surviving spouse (a question which gives rise to the greatest number of proceedings in matters of succession because of the clash of interests involved) differs enormously from country to country. Some countries place the spouse on the same footing as a surviving child, or grant him or her a certain reserved portion (Italy), while others grant the spouse only a limited life interest (for example, Belgium).

   The disparities as regards rules of conflict of laws are equally marked. Some States (Germany, Italy and the Netherlands) apply to succession the national law of the de cujus; others (Belgium and France) refer succession to the law of the domicile as regards movable property and, as regards immovable property, to the law of the place where the property is situated; or (as in Luxembourg) refer to the law of the place where the property is situated in the case of immovable property, but subject movable property to national law.

2. As regards rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship, the divergences between the legal systems are even greater, ranging from joint ownership of all property (Netherlands) through joint ownership of movable property and all property acquired during wedlock (France, Belgium and Luxembourg) or joint ownership of the increase in capital value of assets (Federal Republic of Germany) to the complete separation of property (Italy).

There are also very marked divergences between the rules of conflict of laws, and this provokes positive conflicts between the systems. In some States the rules governing matrimonial property, whether laid down by law or agreed between the parties, are subject to the national law of the husband (Germany, Italy and the Netherlands); in the other States (Belgium, France, and Luxembourg) matrimonial property is subject to the rules impliedly chosen by the spouses at the time of their marriage.

Unlike the preliminary draft the Convention does not expressly exclude gifts from its scope. In this respect it follows the Hague Convention, though gifts will of course be excluded in so far as they relate to succession.

However, the Committee was of the opinion that there might possibly be grounds for resuming discussion of these problems after the Judgments Convention had entered into force, depending on the results of the work currently being done by the Hague Conference and by the International Commission on Civil Status.

It should be stressed that these matters will still be governed, temporarily at least, by existing bilateral conventions, in so far as these conventions apply (see Article 56).

B. Bankruptcy

Bankruptcy is also excluded from the scope of this Convention.

A separate Convention is currently being drafted, since the peculiarities of this branch of law require special rules.

Article 1 (2) excludes bankruptcy, proceedings relating to the winding-up of insolvent companies or other legal persons, judicial arrangements, compositions and analogous proceedings, i.e. those proceedings which, depending on the system of law involved, are based on the suspension of payments, the insolvency of the debtor or his inability to raise credit, and which involve the judicial authorities for the purpose either of compulsory and collective liquidation of the assets or simply of supervision.

[1] The Hague Conference on private international law, recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in matters relating to property rights. Memorandum, with Annexes, by the Permanent Bureau. Preliminary document No 1 of January 1962 for the Special Committee, p. 10.

Thus the Convention will cover proceedings arising from schemes of arrangement out of court, since the latter depend on the intention of the parties and are of a purely contractual nature. The insolvency of a non-trader (déconfiture civile) under French law, which does not involve organized and collective proceedings, cannot be regarded as falling within the category of 'analogous proceedings' within the meaning of Article 1 (2).

Proceedings relating to a bankruptcy are not necessarily excluded from the Convention. Only proceedings arising directly from the bankruptcy (1) and hence falling within the scope of the Bankruptcy Convention of the European Economic Community are excluded from the scope of the Convention (2).

Pending the conclusion of the separate Convention covering bankruptcy, proceedings arising directly from bankruptcy will be governed by the legal rules currently in force, or by the conventions which already exist between certain Contracting States, as provided in Article 56 (3).

C. Social Security

The Committee decided, like the Hague Conference (4), to exclude social security from the scope of the Convention. The reasons were as follows.

In some countries, such as the Federal Republic of Germany, social security is a matter of public law, and in others it falls in the borderline area between private law and public law.

In some States, litigation on social security matters falls within the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts, but in others it falls within the jurisdiction of administrative tribunals; sometimes it lies within the jurisdiction of both (5).

The Committee was moreover anxious to allow current work within the EEC pursuant to Articles 51, 117 and 118 of the Treaty of Rome to develop independently, and to prevent any overlapping on matters of social security between the Convention and agreements already concluded, whether bilaterally or under the auspices of other international organizations such as the International Labour Organization or the Council of Europe.

Social security has not in fact hitherto given rise to conflicts of jurisdiction, since judicial jurisdiction has been taken as coinciding with legislative jurisdiction, which is determined by Community regulations adopted pursuant to Article 51 of the Treaty of Rome; however, the recovery of contributions due to social security bodies still raises problems of enforcement. This matter should therefore be the subject of a special agreement between the Six.

What is meant by social security?

Since this is a field which is in a state of constant development, it did not seem desirable to define it expressly in the Convention, nor even to indicate in an annex what this concept covers, especially as Article 117 of the Treaty of Rome states that one of the Community's objectives is the harmonization of social security systems.

Nevertheless, it should be pointed out that in the six countries benefits are paid in the circumstances listed in Convention No 102 of the International Labour Organization on minimum standards of social security, namely: medical care, sickness benefits, maternity allowances, invalidity benefits, old age and survivors' pensions, benefits for accidents at work and occupational diseases, family allowances and unemployment benefits (6). It may also be useful to refer to the definition given in Articles 1 (c) and 2 of Council Regulation No 3 on social security for migrant workers which, moreover, corresponds to that laid down in Convention No 102 of the ILO.

However, the litigation on social security which is excluded from the scope of the Convention is confined to disputes arising from relationships between the administrative authorities concerned and employers or employees. On the other hand, the Convention is applicable when the authority concerned relies on a right of direct recourse against a third party responsible for injury or damage, or is subrogated as against a third party to the rights of an injured party insured by it, since, in doing so, it is acting in accordance with the ordinary legal rules [1].

D. Arbitration

There are already many international agreements on arbitration. Arbitration is, of course, referred to in Article 220 of the Treaty of Rome. Moreover, the Council of Europe has prepared a European Convention providing a uniform law on arbitration, and this will probably be accompanied by a Protocol which will facilitate the recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards to an even greater extent than the New York Convention. This is why it seemed preferable to exclude arbitration. The Brussels Convention does not apply to the recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards (see the definition in Article 25); it does not apply for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of courts and tribunals in respect of litigation relating to arbitration — for example, proceedings to set aside an arbitral award; and, finally, it does not apply to the recognition of judgments given in such proceedings.

CHAPTER IV

JURISDICTION

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

1. Preliminary remarks

Underlying the Convention is the idea that the Member States of the European Economic Community wanted to set up a common market with characteristics similar to those of a vast internal market. Everything possible must therefore be done not only to eliminate any obstacles to the functioning of this market, but also to promote its development. From this point of view, the territory of the Contracting States may be regarded as forming a single entity: it follows, for the purpose of laying down rules on jurisdiction, that a very clear distinction can be drawn between litigants who are domiciled within the Community and those who are not.

Starting from this basic concept, Title II of the Convention makes a fundamental distinction, in particular in Section 1, between defendants who are domiciled in a Contracting State and those who are domiciled elsewhere.

1. If a person is domiciled in a Contracting State, he must in general be sued in the courts of that State in accordance with the rules of jurisdiction in force in that State (Article 2).

2. If a person is domiciled in a Contracting State, he may be sued in the courts of another Contracting State only if the courts of that State are competent by virtue of the Convention (Article 3).

3. If a person is not domiciled in a Contracting State, that is, if he is domiciled outside the Community, the rules of jurisdiction in force in each Contracting State, including those regarded as exorbitant, are applicable (Article 4).

The instances in which a person domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued in the courts of another Contracting State — or must be so sued, in cases of exclusive jurisdiction or prorogation of jurisdiction — are set out in Sections 2 to 6. Section 7, entitled 'Examination as to jurisdiction . . . and admissibility', is mainly concerned with safeguarding the rights of the defendant.

Section 8 concerns lis pendens and related actions. The very precise rules of this Section are intended to prevent as far as possible conflicting judgments being given in relation to the same dispute in different States.

[1] See Michel Voirin, note under Cass. 16. 2. 1965, Recueil Dalloz 1965, p. 723.

Section 9 relates to provisional and protective measures and provides that application for these may be made to any competent court of a Contracting State, even if, under the Convention, that court does not have jurisdiction over the substance of the matter.

2. Rationale of the basic principles of Title II

The far-reaching nature of the Convention may at first seem surprising. The rules of jurisdiction which it lays down differ fundamentally from those of bilateral conventions which are based on direct jurisdiction (the Conventions between France and Belgium, and between Belgium and the Netherlands, the Benelux Treaty, the Convention between France and Switzerland) and apply not only to nationals of the Contracting States but also to any person, whatever his nationality, who is domiciled in one of those States.

The radical nature of the Convention may not only evoke surprise but also give rise to the objection that the Committee has gone beyond its terms of reference, since Article 220 of the Treaty of Rome provides that States should enter into negotiations with a view to securing 'for the benefit of their nationals' the simplification of formalities governing the recognition and enforcement of judgments. The obvious answer to this is that the extension of the scope of the Convention certainly does not represent a departure from the Treaty of Rome provided the Convention ensures, for the benefit of nationals, the simplification of formalities governing the recognition and enforcement of judgments. Too strict an interpretation of the Treaty of Rome would, moreover, have led to the Convention providing for the recognition and enforcement only of those judgments given in favour of nationals of the Contracting States. Such a limitation would have considerably reduced the scope of the Convention, which would in this regard have been less effective than existing bilateral conventions.

There are several reasons for widening the scope of the Convention by extending in particular the rules of jurisdiction under Title II to all persons, whatever their nationality, who are domiciled in a Contracting State.

First, it would be a retrograde step if common rules of jurisdiction were to be dependent on the nationality of the parties; the connecting factor in international procedure is usually the domicile or residence of the parties (see, for example, Article 3 (1) and (2) of the Hague Convention of 15 April 1958 concerning the recognition and enforcement of decisions relating to maintenance obligations towards children; the Hague Convention of 15 April 1958 on the jurisdiction of the contractual forum in matters relating to the international sale of goods; Article 11 of the Benelux Treaty; and Article 10 (1) of the Hague Convention on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in civil and commercial matters).

Next, the adoption of common rules based on nationality would have caused numerous difficulties in applying the Convention. This method would have necessitated the introduction of different rules of jurisdiction depending on whether the litigation involved nationals of Contracting States, a national of a Contracting State and a foreign national, or two foreign nationals.

In some situations the rules of jurisdiction of the Convention would have had to be applied; in others, national rules of jurisdiction. Under this system the court would, at the commencement of proceedings, automatically have had to carry out an examination of the nationality of the parties, and it is not difficult to imagine the practical problems involved in, for example, establishing the nationality of a defendant who has failed to enter an appearance.

If the Convention had adopted the nationality of the parties as a connecting factor, it might well have been necessary to introduce a special provision to deal with the relatively frequent cases of dual nationality.

The Convention would thus have had to solve many problems which do not strictly speaking fall within its scope. Using nationality as a criterion would inevitably have led to a considerable increase in the effect of those rules of jurisdiction which may be termed exorbitant. Thus, for example, a judgment given in France or Luxembourg on the basis of Article 14 of the Civil Code in an action between a national of France or Luxembourg and a national of a non-Member State of the Community would have had to be recognized and enforced in Germany even if the foreign national was domiciled in Germany and a generally recognized jurisdiction, that of the defendant's domicile, thus existed.

By ruling out the criterion of nationality, the Committee is anxious not only to simplify the application of the Convention by giving it a unity which allows a uniform interpretation, but also, in fairness, to allow foreign nationals domiciled in the Community, who are established there and who thereby contribute to its economic activity and prosperity, to benefit from the provisions of the Convention.

Moreover, the purpose of the Convention is also, by establishing common rules of jurisdiction, to achieve, in relations between the Six and in the field which it was required to cover, a genuine legal systematization which will ensure the greatest possible degree of legal certainty. To this end, the rules of jurisdiction codified in Title II determine which State's courts are most appropriate to assume jurisdiction, taking into account all relevant matters; the approach here adopted means that the nationality of the parties is no longer of importance.

3. Determination of domicile

As already shown, the rules of jurisdiction are based on the defendant's domicile. Determining that domicile is therefore a matter of the greatest importance.

The Committee was faced with numerous questions which proved difficult to resolve. Should the Convention include a common definition of domicile? Should domicile possibly be replaced by the concept of habitual residence? Should both domicile and habitual residence be used? Should the term domicile be qualified?

1. Should the Convention include a common definition of domicile?

   The first point to note is that the concept of domicile is not defined in the Conventions between France and Belgium, Belgium and the Netherlands, Germany and Belgium, and Italy and Belgium, nor in the Benelux Treaty.

   It is, however, defined in the Conventions between France and Italy (Article 28), between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 11), and between Germany and Italy (Article 13); but these Conventions are all based on indirect jurisdiction.

   At first, the Committee thought of defining domicile in the Convention itself, but it finally rejected this course of action. Such a definition would have fallen outside the scope of the Convention, and properly belongs in a uniform law [1]. To define the concept of domicile in international conventions might even be dangerous, as this could lead to a multiplicity of definitions and so to inconsistency.

   Moreover, such definitions run the risk of being superseded by developments in national law.

2. Should domicile be replaced by habitual residence?

   This course was similarly rejected. It was pointed out that the term 'habitual' was open to conflicting interpretations, since the laws of some of the Member States provide that an entry in the population registers is conclusive proof of habitual residence.

   The adoption of this course would, moreover, represent a divergence from that followed under the laws of the Contracting States, the majority of which use domicile as a basis of jurisdiction [2].

[1] The concept of domicile has been specified by the European Committee for Legal Cooperation, set up by the Council of Europe, as one of the basic legal concepts which should be defined.

Netherlands

Adopting habitual residence as the sole criterion would have raised new problems as regards jurisdiction over persons whose domicile depends or may depend on that of another person or on the location of an authority (e.g. minors or married women).

Finally, in a treaty based on direct jurisdiction, it is particularly important that jurisdiction should have a secure legal basis for the court seised of the matter. The concept of domicile, while not without drawbacks, does however introduce the idea of a more fixed and stable place of establishment on the part of the defendant than does the concept of habitual residence.

3. Should both domicile and habitual residence be adopted?

In a treaty based on direct jurisdiction, the inclusion of both criteria would result in the major disadvantage that the number of competent courts would be increased. If the domicile and the place of habitual residence happened to be in different States, national rules of jurisdiction of both the States concerned would be applicable by virtue of Article 2 of the Convention, thus defeating the object of the Convention. Moreover, the inclusion of both criteria could increase the number of cases of lis pendens and related actions. For these reasons, the Committee preferred finally to adopt only the concept of domicile.

4. Should the concept of domicile be qualified?

In view of the varied interpretations of the concept of domicile, the Committee considered that the implementation of the Convention would be facilitated by the inclusion of a provision specifying the law to be applied in determining domicile. The absence of such a provision might give rise to claims and disclaimers of jurisdiction; the purpose of Article 52 is to avoid this.

Article 52 deals with three different situations:

(i) where the court of a Contracting State must determine whether a person is domiciled in that State;

(ii) where the court must determine whether a person is domiciled in another Contracting State; and finally,

(iii) where the court must determine whether a person's domicile depends on that of another person or on the seat of an authority.

Article 52 does not deal with the case of a person domiciled outside the Community. In this case the court seised of the matter must apply its rules of private international law.

Nor does Article 52 attempt to resolve the conflicts which might arise if a court seised of a matter ruled that a defendant were to be considered as having his domicile in two other Contracting States, or in one Contracting State and a third country. According to the basic principles of Title II the court, having found that a person is domiciled in some other Contracting State, must, in order to determine its own jurisdiction, apply the rules set out in Article 3 and in Sections 2 to 6 of the Convention.

In most disputed cases it will be necessary to determine where the defendant is domiciled.

However, when applying certain provisions of the Convention, in particular Article 5 (2) and the first paragraph of Article 8, the rules set out will be used to determine the plaintiff's domicile. For this reason Article 52 does not specify either the defendant or the plaintiff since, in the opinion of the Committee, the same provisions for determining domicile must apply to both parties.

Under the first paragraph of Article 52, only the internal law of the court seised of the matter can determine whether a domicile exists in that State. It follows that, if there is a conflict between the lex fori and the law of another Contracting State when determining the domicile of a party, the lex fori prevails. For example, if a defendant sued in a French court is domiciled both in France, because he has his principal place of business there, and in Belgium, because his name is entered there in the official population registers, where the laws conflict the French court must apply only French law. If it is established under that law that the defendant is in fact domiciled in France, the court need take no other law into consideration. This is justified on various grounds. First, to take the example given, a defendant, by establishing his domicile in a given country, subjects himself to the law of that country. Next, only if the lex fori prevails can the court examine whether it has jurisdiction; as the Convention requires it to do, in cases where the defendant fails to enter an appearance (Article 20).

Where the courts of different Contracting States are properly seised of a matter — for example, the Belgian court because it is the court for the place where the defendant's name is entered in the population registers, and the French court because it is the court for the place where he has his principal place of business — the conflict may be resolved by applying the rules governing lis pendens or related actions.

The second paragraph covers the case of a defendant who is not domiciled in the State whose courts are seised of the matter. The court must then determine whether he is domiciled in another Contracting State, and to do this the internal law of that other State must be applied.

This rule will be applied in particular where a defendant is sued in the courts of a Contracting State in which he is not domiciled. If the jurisdiction of the court is contested, then, following the basic principles of Title II, whether or not the court has jurisdiction will vary according to whether the defendant is domiciled in another Contracting State or outside the Community. Thus, for example, a person domiciled outside the Community may properly be sued in Belgium in the court for the place where the contract was concluded (1) while a person domiciled in another Contracting State and sued in the same court may refuse to accept its jurisdiction, since Article 5 (1) of the Convention provides that only the courts for the place of performance of the obligation in question have jurisdiction. Thus if a defendant wishes to contest the jurisdiction of the Belgian court, he must establish that he is domiciled in a Contracting State.

Under the second paragraph of Article 52 the Belgian court must, in order to determine whether the defendant is domiciled in another Contracting State, apply the internal law of that State.

The Committee considered it both more equitable and more logical to apply the law of the State of the purported domicile rather than the lex fori.

If a court, seised of a matter in which the defendant was domiciled in another Contracting State, applied its own law to determine the defendant's domicile, the defendant might under that law not be regarded as being domiciled in the other Contracting State even though under the law of that other State he was in fact domiciled there. This solution becomes all the more untenable when one realises that a person establishing his domicile in a Contracting State can obviously not be expected to consider whether this domicile is regarded as such under a foreign law (2).

On the other hand, where the law of the State of the purported domicile has two definitions of domicile (3), that of the Civil Code and that of the Code of Civil Procedure, the latter should obviously be used since the problem is one of jurisdiction.

The third principle laid down by Article 52 concerns persons such as minors or married women whose domicile depends on that of another person or on the seat of an authority.

Under this provision national law is applied twice. For example, the national law of a minor first determines whether his domicile is dependent on that of another person. If it is, the national law of the minor similarly determines where that domicile is situated (e.g. where his guardian is domiciled). If, however, the domicile of the dependent person is under his national law not dependent on that of another person or on the seat of an authority, the first or second paragraph of Article 52 may be applied to determine the domicile of the dependent person. These two paragraphs also apply for the purpose of determining the domicile from which that of the dependent person derives.

The members of the Committee were alive to the difficulties which may arise in the event of dual nationality, and more especially in determining the domicile of a married woman. For example, where a German woman marries a Frenchman an acquires French nationality while retaining her German

(2) NIBOYET, Traité de droit international privé français, Vol. VI, No 1723: 'It is submitted that domicile is not systematically determined according to the lex fori, but according to the law of the country where the domicile is alleged to be. French law alone can therefore determine whether a person is domiciled in France; but whether a person is domiciled in any particular foreign country is a matter, not for French law, but for the law of the country concerned.'

(3) Such might for example be the case in Belgium, where Article 102 of the Civil Code provides that the domicile of a Belgian in so far as the exercise of his civil rights is concerned is where he has his principal establishment, while Article 36 of the Judicial Code provides that, for the purpose of that Code, a person is deemed to be domiciled in the place where his name is entered in the official population registers.

nationality, her domicile under French law (1) is that of her husband, whereas under German law she can have a separate domicile, since German law no longer provides that a married woman has the domicile of her husband (2). In cases of this kind, the Committee considered that the usual rules relating to dual nationality should be applied. Thus, even if she has a separate domicile in Germany, that person may be sued in France in the court for the husband's domicile, since the French court must apply French law. If, however, she is sued in Germany in the court for the place of her own domicile, the German court will apply German law and declare that it has jurisdiction.

Finally, it should be made clear that the concept of domicile within the meaning of the Convention does not extend to the legal fiction of an address for service of process.

B. COMMENTARY ON THE SECTIONS OF TITLE II

Section 1

General provisions

Section 1 sets out the main principles on which the rules of jurisdicition laid down by the Convention are founded:

1. the rule that a defendant domiciled in a Contracting State is in general to be sued in the courts of that State (Article 2);

2. the rule that a person domiciled in a Contracting State may in certain circumstances be sued in the courts of another Contracting State (Article 3);

3. the rule that a person domiciled outside the Community is subject to all applicable national rules of jurisdiction (Article 4).

This Section also embodies the widely applied principle of equality of treatment (3), which is already enshrined in Article 1 of the Convention between France and Belgium of 8 July 1899, Article 1 of the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands of 28 March 1925 and Article 1 of the Benelux Treaty of 24 November 1961. Whilst this principle thus forms an integral part of treaties based on direct jurisdiction, in this Convention it also ensures implementation of the mandatory rules of the Treaty of Rome. Article 7 of that Treaty lays down the principle of non-discrimination between nationals of Member States of the Community.

Specific provisions applying the general principle set out in Article 7 of the Treaty of Rome to the right of establishment are laid down in Article 52 et seq. of that Treaty.

During the preparation of the General Programme on establishment, the Economic and Social Committee of the European Communities drew particular attention to this aspect of the problem by requesting that equality of treatment as regards legal protection be achieved in full as quickly as possible.

Article 2

The maxim 'actor sequitur forum rei', which expresses the fact that law leans in favour of the defendant, is even more relevant in the international sphere than it is in national law (4). It is more difficult, generally speaking, to defend oneself in the courts of a foreign country than in those of another town in the country where one is domiciled.

A defendant domiciled in a Contracting State need not necessarily be sued in the court for the place where he is domiciled or has his seat. He may be sued in any court of the State where he is domiciled which has jurisdiction under the law of that State.

As a result, if a defendant is sued in one of the courts of the State in which he is domiciled, the internal rules of jurisdiction of that State are fully applicable. Here the Convention requires the application of the national law of the court seised of the matter; the Convention determines whether the courts of the State in question have jurisdiction, and the law of that State in turn determines whether a particular court in that State has jurisdiction. This solution seems equitable since it is usual for a defendant domiciled in a State to be subject to the internal law of that State without it being necessary for the Convention to provide special rules for his protection. It is, moreover, an extremely practical solution because it means that in most cases the court will not have to take the Convention any further into consideration.

Defendants are usually sued in the courts of the State in which they are domiciled. This is true of proceedings in which there is no international element. It is also true of proceedings with an international element in which, by application of the traditionally accepted maxim 'actor sequitur forum rei', the defendant is sued in the courts of the State of his domicile. The Convention does not therefore involve a general reversal of national rules of jurisdiction nor of the practice of judges and lawyers. In fact, judges and lawyers will need to take account of the changes effected by the Convention only in cases where a defendant is sued in a court of a State where he is not domiciled, or in one of the few cases in which the Convention has laid down common rules of exclusive jurisdiction.

The second paragraph of Article 2 embodies the principle of equality of treatment where a foreigner is domiciled in the State of the forum. Such foreigner, whether he is defendant or plaintiff, is governed in that State by the same rules of jurisdiction as its nationals, or more precisely, as its nationals who are domiciled in that State, where, as in Italy, the law of that State determines the jurisdiction of its courts according to whether the national concerned is domiciled in its territory.

As a result, Article 52 of the Belgian Law of 25 March 1876 will no longer be applicable as such to foreigners domiciled in Belgium (1).

The positive aspect of equality of treatment is set out in the second paragraph of Article 4.

Article 3

Article 3 deals with those cases in which a defendant domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued in another Contracting State. This Article lays down the principle that a defendant may be sued otherwise than in the courts of the State where he is domiciled only in the cases expressly provided for in the Convention. The rule sets aside the rules of exorbitant jurisdiction in force in each of the Contracting States. However, these rules of jurisdiction are not totally excluded; they are excluded only in respect of persons who are domiciled in another Contracting State. Thus they remain in force with respect to persons who are not domiciled within the Community.

The second paragraph of Article 3 prohibits the application of the most important and best known of the rules of exorbitant jurisdiction. While this paragraph is not absolutely essential it will nevertheless facilitate the application of certain provisions of the Convention (see, in particular, Article 59).

The following are the rules of exorbitant jurisdiction in question in each of the States concerned.

In Belgium

Articles 52, 52bis and 53 of the Law of 25 March 1876, which govern territorial jurisdiction in actions brought by Belgians (2) or by foreigners against foreigners before Belgian courts, and Article 15 of the Civil Code which corresponds to Article 15 of the French Civil Code.

In Germany

The nationality of the parties does not in general affect the rules of jurisdiction. Article 23 of the Code of Civil Procedure lays down that, where no other German court has jurisdiction, actions relating to property instituted against a person who is not domiciled in the national territory come under the jurisdiction of the court for the place where the property or subject of the dispute is situated.

German courts have in a number of cases given a very liberal interpretation to this provision, thereby leading some authors to state that Article 23 'can be likened to Article 14 of the French Civil Code' (3).

In France

1. Article 14 of the Civil Code provides that any French plaintiff may sue a foreigner or another Frenchman in the French courts, even if there is no connection between the cause of action and those courts.

2. Article 15 of the Civil Code provides that a Frenchman may always be sued in the French courts by a Frenchman or by a foreigner, and can even insist on this.

Despite the fact that Articles 14 and 15 in terms refer only to contractual obligations, case law has extended their scope beyond contractual obligations to all actions whether or not relating to property rights. There are thus only two limitations to the general application of Articles 14 and 15: French courts are never competent to hear either actions in rem concerning immovable property situated abroad, or actions concerning proceedings for enforcement which is to take place abroad (1).

In Italy

1. Article 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an agreement to substitute for the jurisdiction of Italian courts the jurisdiction of a foreign court or arbitral tribunal will be valid only in the case of litigation between foreigners, or between a foreigner and an Italian citizen who is neither resident nor domiciled in Italy, and only if the agreement is evidenced in writing.

2. (a) Under Article 4 (1) of the Code of Civil Procedure, a foreigner may be sued in an Italian court if he is resident or domiciled in Italy, or if he has an address for service there or has a representative who is authorized to bring legal proceedings in his name, or if he has accepted Italian jurisdiction, unless the proceedings concern immovable property situated abroad.

   (b) Under Article 4 (2) of the Code of Civil Procedure, a foreigner may be sued in the courts of the Italian Republic if the proceedings concern property situated in Italy, or succession to the estate of an Italian national, or an application for probate made in Italy, or obligations which arose in Italy or which must be performed there.

3. The interpretation given to Article 4 by Italian case law means that an Italian defendant may always be sued in the Italian courts (2).

In Luxembourg

Articles 14 and 15 of the Civil Code correspond to Articles 14 and 15 of the French Civil Code.

Luxembourg case law applies the same principles of interpretation as French case law.

In the Netherlands

Article 126 (3) of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, in personal matters or matters concerning movable property, a defendant who has no known domicile or residence in the Kingdom shall be sued in the court for the domicile of the plaintiff. This provision applies whether or not the plaintiff is a Netherlands national (3).

Article 127 provides that a foreigner, even if he does not reside in the Netherlands, may be sued in a Netherlands court for the performance of obligations contracted towards a Netherlander either in the Netherlands or abroad.

Article 4

Article 4 applies to all proceedings in which the defendant is not domiciled in a Contracting State, and provides that the rules of internal law remain in force.

This is justified on two grounds:

First, in order to ensure the free movement of judgments, this Article prevents refusal of recognition or enforcement of a judgment given on the basis of rules of internal law relating to jurisdiction. In the absence of such a provision, a judgment debtor would be able to prevent execution being levied on his property simply by transferring it to a Community country other than that in which judgment was given.

Secondly, this Article may perform a function in the case of lis pendens. Thus, for example, if a French court is seised of an action between a Frenchman and a defendant domiciled in America, and a German court is seised of the same matter on the basis of Article 23 of the Code of Civil Procedure, one of the two courts must in the interests of the proper administration of justice decline jurisdiction in favour of the other. This issue cannot be settled unless the jurisdiction of these courts derives from the Convention.

In the absence of an article such as Article 4, there would be no rule in the Convention expressly recognizing the jurisdiction of the French and German courts in a case of this kind.

The only exception to the application of the rules of jurisdiction of internal law is the field of exclusive jurisdiction (Article 16) (1). The rules which grant exclusive jurisdiction to the courts of a State are applicable whatever the domicile of the defendant.

However, the question arises why the Committee did not extend the scope of the provision limiting the application of rules of exorbitant jurisdiction to include in particular nationals of Member States regardless of their place of domicile.

In other words, and to take another example based on Article 14 of the French Civil Code, why will it still be possible for a French plaintiff to sue in the French courts a foreigner, or even a national of a Member State of the Community, who is domiciled outside the Community?

The Committee thought that it would have been unreasonable to prevent the rules of exorbitant jurisdiction from applying to persons, including Community nationals, domiciled outside the Community. Thus, for example, a Belgian national domiciled outside the Community might own assets in the Netherlands. The Netherlands courts have no jurisdiction in the matter since the Convention does not recognize jurisdiction based on the presence of assets within a State. If Article 14 of the French Civil Code could not be applied, a French plaintiff would have to sue the Belgian defendant in a court outside the Community, and the judgment could not be enforced in the Netherlands if there were no enforcement treaty between the Netherlands and the non-member State in which judgment was given.

This, moreover, was the solution adopted in the Conventions between France and Belgium, and between Belgium and the Netherlands, and in the Benelux Treaty, which, however, take nationality as their criterion (2).

The second paragraph of Article 4 of the Convention constitutes a positive statement of the principle of equality of treatment already laid down in the second paragraph of Article 2. An express provision was considered necessary in order to avoid any uncertainty (3). Under this provision, any person domiciled in a Contracting State has the right, as plaintiff, to avail himself in that State of the same rules of jurisdiction as a national of that State.

This principle had already been expressly laid down in the Convention between France and Belgium of 8 July 1899 (Article 1 (2)).

This positive aspect of the principle of equality of treatment was regarded as complementing the right of establishment (Article 52 et seq. of the Treaty of Rome), the existence of which implies, as was stated in the General Programme for the abolition of restrictions on freedom of establishment of 18 December 1961 (4), that any natural or legal person established in a Member State should enjoy the same legal protection as a national of that State.

The provision is also justified on economic grounds. Since rules of exorbitant jurisdiction can still be invoked against foreigners domiciled outside the European Economic Community, persons who are domiciled in the Member State concerned and who thus contribute to the economic life of the Community should be able to invoke such rules in the same way as the nationals of that State.

It may be thought surprising that the Convention extends the 'privileges of jurisdiction' in this way, since equality of treatment is granted in each of the States to all persons, whatever their nationality, who are domiciled in that State.

(1) The third paragraph of Article 8, which concerns jurisdiction in respect of insurers who are not domiciled in the Community but have a branch or agency there, may also be regarded as an exception.

(2) The Convention between France and Belgium is interpreted to mean that a Frenchman may not rely on Article 14 of the Civil Code to sue in France a Belgian domiciled in Belgium, but may do so to sue a Belgian domiciled abroad. BATIFFOL, Traité élémentaire de droit international privé, No 714.

(3) According to French case law on the Treaty of 9 February 1842 between France and Denmark, a Danish national may not rely on Article 14 of the French Civil Code.

(4) Official Journal of the European Communities, 15. 1. 1962, p. 36 et seq.

It should first be noted that such treatment is already granted to foreigners in Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and the Netherlands, where the rules of exorbitant jurisdiction may be invoked by foreigners as well as by nationals. The second paragraph of Article 4 therefore merely brings into line with these laws the French and Luxembourg concepts, according to which Article 14 of the Civil Code constitutes a privilege of nationality.

Secondly, the solution adopted in the Convention follows quite naturally from the fact that, for the reasons already given, the Convention uses domicile as the criterion for determining jurisdiction. In this context it must not be forgotten that it will no longer be possible to invoke the privileges of jurisdiction against persons domiciled in the Community, although it will be possible to invoke them against nationals of the Community countries who have established their domicile outside the territory of the Six.

Section 2

Special jurisdiction

Articles 5 and 6

Articles 5 and 6 list the situations in which a defendant may be sued in a Contracting State other than that of his domicile. The forums provided for in these Articles supplement those which apply under Article 2. In the case of proceedings for which a court is specifically recognized as having jurisdiction under these Articles, the plaintiff may, at his option, bring the proceedings either in that court or in the competent courts of the State in which the defendant is domiciled.

One problem which arose here was whether it should always be possible to sue the defendant in one of the courts provided for in these Articles, or whether this should be allowed only if the jurisdiction of that court was also recognized by the internal law of the State concerned.

In other words, in the first case, jurisdiction would derive directly from the Convention and in the second there would need to be dual jurisdiction: that of the Convention and that of the internal law on local jurisdiction. Thus, for example, where Netherlands law on jurisdiction does not recognize the court for the place of performance of the obligation, can the plaintiff nevertheless sue the defendant before that court in the Netherlands? In addition, would there be any obligation on the Netherlands to adapt its national laws in order to give that court jurisdiction?

By adopting 'special' rules of jurisdiction, that is by directly designating the competent court without referring to the rules of jurisdiction in force in the State where such a court might be situated, the Committee decided that a plaintiff should always be able to sue a defendant in one of the forums provided for without having to take the internal law of the State concerned into consideration. Further, in laying down these rules, the Committee intended to facilitate implementation of the Convention. By ratifying the Convention, the Contracting States will avoid having to take any other measures to adapt their internal legislation to the criteria laid down in Articles 5 and 6. The Convention itself determines which court has jurisdiction.

Adoption of the 'special' rules of jurisdiction is also justified by the fact that there must be a close connecting factor between the dispute and the court with jurisdiction to resolve it. Thus, to take the example of the forum delicti commissi, a person domiciled in a Contracting State other than the Netherlands who has caused an accident in The Hague may, under the Convention, be sued in a court in The Hague. This accident cannot give other Netherlands courts jurisdiction over the defendant. On this point there is thus a distinct difference between Article 2 and Articles 5 and 6, due to the fact that in Article 2 domicile is the connecting factor.

Forum contractus (Article 5 (1)) including contracts of employment

There are great differences between the laws of the Six in their attitude to the jurisdiction of the forum contractus; in some countries this jurisdiction is not recognized (the Netherlands, Luxembourg), while in others it exists in varying degrees. Belgian law recognizes the jurisdiction of the courts for the place where the obligation arose, and also that of the courts for the place where the obligation has been or is to be performed (1); Italian law recognizes only the jurisdiction of the courts for the place where the obligation arose and where it has been performed (2); German law in general recognizes only the jurisdiction of the courts for the place where the obligation has been performed [1]; and, finally. French law recognizes the jurisdiction of the forum contractus only to a limited extent and subject to certain conditions [2].

(2) Articles 4 and 20 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Some of the conventions concluded between the Six reject this forum, while others accept it in varying degrees. Article 2 (1) of the Convention between France and Belgium provides that, where a defendant is neither domiciled nor resident in France or Belgium, a Belgian or French plaintiff may institute proceedings in the courts for the place where the obligation arose or where it has been or is to be performed [3].

Article 4 of the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands provides that in civil or commercial matters a plaintiff may bring a personal action concerning movable property in the courts for the place where the obligation arose or where it has been or is to be performed.

In Article 3 (5) of the Convention between Belgium and Germany, jurisdiction is recognized where, in matters relating to a contract, proceedings are instituted in a court of the State where the obligation has been or is to be performed.

Article 14 of the Convention between France and Italy provides that if the action concerns a contract which is considered as a commercial matter by the law of the country in which the action is brought, a French or Italian plaintiff may seise the courts of either of the two countries in which the contract was concluded or is to be performed.

The Convention between Belgium and Italy (Article 2 (5)) recognizes jurisdiction where, in matters relating to a contract, an action is brought before the courts of the State where the obligation arose, or where it has been or should have been performed.

There are no provisions on this subject in the Conventions between Italy and the Netherlands, Germany and Italy, and Germany and the Netherlands.

Finally, the Benelux Treaty adopts Article 4 of the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands, but includes a Protocol which in Article 1 lays down that Article 4 shall not apply where Luxembourg is concerned if the defendant is domiciled or resident in the country of which he is a national [4].

Article 5 (1) provides a compromise between the various national laws.

The jurisdiction of the forum is, as in German law, limited to matters relating to contract. It could have been restricted to commercial matters, but account must be taken of the fact that European integration will mean an increase in the number of contractual relationships entered into. To have confined it to commercial matters would moreover have raised the problem of classification.

Only the jurisdiction of the forum solutionis has been retained, that is to say the jurisdiction of the courts for the place of performance of the obligation on which the claim is based. The reasons for this are as follows.

The Committee considered that it would be unwise to give jurisdiction to a number of courts, and thus possibly create conflicts of jurisdiction. A plaintiff already has a choice, in matters relating to a contract, between the competent courts of the State where the defendant is domiciled, or, where there is more than one defendant, the courts for the place where any one of them is domiciled, or finally, the courts for the place of performance of the obligation in question.

If the Committee had adopted as wide-ranging a provision as that of the Benelux Treaty, which recognizes also the jurisdiction of the courts for the place where the obligation arose, this would have involved very considerable changes for those States whose laws do not recognize that forum, or do so only with certain restrictions.

There was also concern that acceptance of the jurisdiction of the courts for the place where the obligation arose might sanction, by indirect means, the jurisdiction of the forum of the plaintiff. To have accepted this forum would have created tremendous problems of classification, in particular in the case of contracts concluded by parties who are absent.

The court for the place of performance of the obligation will be useful in proceedings for the recovery of fees: the creditor will have a choice between the courts of the State where the defendant is domiciled and the courts of another State within whose jurisdiction the services were provided, particularly where, according to the appropriate law, the obligation to pay must be performed where the services were provided. This forum can also be used where expert evidence or inquiries are required. The special position of Luxembourg justified, as in the Benelux Treaty, the inclusion of a special provision in the Protocol (Article I).

Contracts of employment

In matters relating to contracts of employment in the broadest sense of the term, the preliminary draft of the Convention contained a provision attributing exclusive jurisdiction to the courts of the Contracting State either in which the undertaking concerned was situated, or in which the work was to have been or had been performed. After prolonged consideration, the Committee decided not to insert in the Convention any special provisions on jurisdiction in this field. Its reasoning was as follows.

First, work is at present in progress within the Commission of the EEC to harmonize the provisions of labour law in the Member States. It is desirable that disputes over contracts of employment should as far as possible be brought before the courts of the State whose law governs the contract. The Committee therefore did not think that rules of jurisdiction should be laid down which might not coincide with those which may later be adopted for determining the applicable law.

In order to lay down such rules of jurisdiction, the Committee would have had to take into account not only the different ways in which work can be carried out abroad, but also the various categories of worker: wage-earning or salaried workers recruited abroad to work permanently for an undertaking, or those temporarily transferred abroad by an undertaking to work for it there; commercial agents, management, etc. Any attempt by the Committee to draw such distinctions might have provided a further hindrance to the Commission's work.

Next, in most Member States of the Community the principle of freedom of contract still plays an important part; a rule of exclusive jurisdiction such as that previously provided for in Article 16 would have nullified any agreements conferring jurisdiction.

The general rules of the Convention will therefore apply to contracts of employment. Thus, in litigation between employers and employees, the following courts have jurisdiction: the courts of the State where the defendant is domiciled (Article 2); the courts for the place of performance of the obligation, if that place is in a State other than that of the domicile of the defendant (Article 5 (1)); and any court on which the parties have expressly or impliedly agreed (Articles 17 and 18). In the case of proceedings based on a tort committed at work (Article 2, Nos 2 and 3 of the Arbeitsgerichtsgesetz), Article 5 (3), which provides for the jurisdiction of the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred, could also apply. It seems that these rules will, for the time being, prove of greater value to the persons concerned than a provision similar to that of the former Article 16 (2), which could not be derogated from because it prohibited any agreement conferring jurisdiction.

The rules on the recognition and enforcement of judgments will probably ensure additional protection for employees. If the law of the State addressed had to be applied to a contract of employment, the courts of that State, upon being seised of an application for recognition or enforcement of a foreign judgment, would, on the basis of Article 27 (1), which permits refusal of recognition (or enforcement) on grounds of public policy in the State addressed, be able to refuse the application if the court of the State of origin had failed to apply, or had misapplied, an essential provision of the law of the State addressed.

Once the work of the Commission in this field has been completed, it will always be possible to amend the provisions of the Convention, either by means of an additional Protocol, or by the drafting of a convention governing the whole range of problems relating to contracts of employment, which would, under Article 57, prevail over the Convention.

Maintenance obligations (Article 5 (2))

Matters relating to maintenance are governed by the Convention.

The Convention is in a sense an extension of the Hague Convention of 15 April 1958 concerning the recognition and enforcement of decisions relating to maintenance obligations in respect of children [1], since it ensures the recognition and enforcement of judgments granting maintenance to creditors other than children, and also of the New York Convention of 20 June 1956 on the recovery abroad of maintenance (1).

The Committee decided that jurisdiction should be conferred on the forum of the creditior, for the same reasons as the draftsmen of the Hague Convention (2). For one thing, a convention which did not recognize the forum of the maintenance creditor would be of only limited value, since the creditor would be obliged to bring the claim before the court having jurisdiction over the defendant.

If the Convention did not confer jurisdiction on the forum of the maintenance creditor, it would apply only in those situations where the defendant against whom an order had been made subsequently changed residence, or where the defendant possessed property in a country other than that in which the order was made.

Moreover the court for the place of domicile of the maintenance creditor is in the best position to know whether the creditor is in need and to determine the extent of such need.

However, in order to align the Convention with the Hague Convention, Article 5 (2) also confers jurisdiction on the courts for the place of habitual residence of the maintenance creditor. This alternative is justified in relation to maintenance obligations since it enables in particular a wife deserted by her husband to sue him for payment of maintenance in the courts for the place where she herself is habitually resident, rather than the place of her legal domicile.

The Convention also supplements the New York Convention of 20 June 1956 on the recovery abroad of maintenance. The latter is limited to providing that a forwarding authority will transmit to an intermediate body any judgment already given in favour of a maintenance creditor, and that body will then have to begin proceedings for enforcement or registration of the judgment, or institute new proceedings altogether.

This Convention, by simplifying the formalities governing enforcement, will thus facilitate implementation of the New York Convention.

As regards maintenance payments, the Committee did not overlook the problems which might be raised by preliminary issues (for example, the question of affiliation). However, it considered that these were not properly problems of jurisdiction, and that any difficulties should be considered in the chapter on recognition and enforcement of judgments.

It was suggested that, in order to avoid conflicting judgments, it might be desirable to provide that the court which had fixed the amount of a maintenance payment should be the only court to have jurisdiction to vary it. The Committee did not think it necessary to adopt such a solution. This would have obliged parties, neither of whom had any further connection with the original court, to bring proceedings before courts which could be very far away. Moreover, any judgment by a second court, in order to vary that of the first court, would have to be based on changed facts, and in those circumstances it could not be maintained that the judgments were in conflict (3).

Forum delicti commissi (Article 5 (3) and (4))

This jurisdiction is recognized by the national laws of the Member States with the exception of Luxembourg and the Netherlands, where it exists only in respect of collisions of ships and of road accidents.

The following are applicable in Belgium, Articles 41, and 52 (3) of the Law of 1876 (4); in Germany, Article 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure; in France, Article 59 (12) of the Code of Civil Procedure and Article 21 of the Decree of 22 December 1958; and in Italy, Article 20 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

This jurisdiction is incorporated in the bilateral conventions by the following provisions: Article 4 of the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands and Article 4 of the Benelux Treaty, which cover all obligations concerning movable property, whether statutory, contractual or non-contractual (5); Article 2 (b) of the Convention between Belgium and Italy; Article 3 (1) (6) of the Convention between Germany and Belgium; Article 15 of the Convention between France and Italy; Article 2 (4) of the Convention between Germany and Italy; and Article 4 (1) (e) of the Convention between Germany and the Netherlands.

The fact that this jurisdiction is recognized under most of the legal systems, and incorporated in the majority of the bilateral conventions, was a ground for including it in the Convention, especially in view of the high number of road accidents.

Article 5 (3) uses the expression 'the place where the harmful event occurred'. The Committee did not think it should specify whether that place is the place where the event which resulted in damage or injury occurred, or whether it is the place where the damage or injury was sustained. The Committee preferred to keep to a formula which has already been adopted by number of legal systems (Germany, France).

Article 5 (4) provides that a civil claim may be brought before a court seised of criminal proceedings; this is in order to take into account the rules of jurisdiction laid down by the various codes of criminal procedure. A civil claim can thus always be brought, whatever the domicile of the defendant, in the criminal court having jurisdiction to entertain the criminal proceedings even if the place where the court sits (place of arrest, for example) is not the same as that where the harmful event occurred.

Jurisdiction based on a dispute arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment (Article 5 (5))

This jurisdiction exists in the bilateral conventions already concluded between the Contracting States: the Conventions between Italy and Belgium (Article 2 (3)), between Belgium and Germany (Article 2 (1) (4)), between France and Belgium (Article 3 (2)), between France and Italy (Article 13), between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 2 (3)), and between Belgium and the Netherlands (Article 5 (3)); the Benelux Treaty (Article 5 (4)); and the Conventions between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 4 (1) (d)), and between Germany and Italy (Article 2 (3)).

This provision concerns only defendants domiciled in a Contracting State (Article 5), that is, companies or firms having their seat in one Contracting State and having a branch, agency or other establishment in another Contracting State. Companies or firms which have their seat outside the Community but have a branch, etc. in a Contracting State are governed by Article 4, even as regards disputes relating to the activities of their branches, but without prejudice to the provisions of Article 8 relating to insurance.

More than one defendant (Article 6 (1))

Where there is more than one defendant, the courts for the place where any one of the defendants is domiciled are recognized as having jurisdiction. This jurisdiction is provided for in the internal law of Belgium (1), France (2), Italy (3), Luxembourg (4) and the Netherlands (5).

It is not in general provided for in German law. Where an action must be brought in Germany against a number of defendants and there is no jurisdiction to which they are all subject, the court having jurisdiction may, subject to certain conditions, be designated by the superior court which is next above it (Article 36 (3) of the German Code of Civil Procedure).

This jurisdiction is also provided for in the Conventions between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 2 (1)), between Italy and Belgium (Article 2 (1)), between France and Italy (Article 11 (2)), and between Germany and Italy (Article 2 (1)). However, under the latter Convention, jurisdiction depends on the existence of a procedural requirement that the various defendants be joined.

It follows from the text of the Convention that, where there are several defendants domiciled in different Contracting States, the plaintiff can at his option sue them all in the courts for the place where any one of them is domiciled.

In order for this rule to be applicable there must be a connection between the claims made against each of the defendants, as for example in the case of joint debtors (6). It follows that action cannot be brought solely with the object of ousting the jurisdiction of the courts of the State in which the defendant is domiciled (7).

Jurisdiction derived from the domicile of one of the defendants was adopted by the Committee because it makes it possible to obviate the handing down in the Contracting States of judgments which are irreconcilable with one another.

Actions on a warranty or guarantee, third party proceedings, counterclaims.

(a) Actions on a warranty or guarantee (Article 6 (2))

An action on a warranty or guarantee brought against a third party by the defendant in an action for the purpose of being indemnified against the consequences of that action, is available in Belgian (1), French (2), Italian (3), Luxembourg (4) and Netherlands (5) law.

The proceeding which corresponds to an action on a warranty or guarantee in Germany is governed by Articles 72, 73 and 74 and Article 68 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

A party who in any proceedings considers that, if he is unsuccessful, he has a right of recourse on a warranty or guarantee against a third party, may join that third party in the proceedings (Article 72) (Streitverkündung — litis denunciatio).

The notice joining the third party must be served on that party and a copy must be sent to the other party (Article 73). No judgment can be given as regards the third party, but the judgment given in the original proceedings is binding in the sense that the substance of the judgment cannot be contested in the subsequent action which the defendant may bring against the third party (Article 68). Under the German Code of Civil Procedure the defendant can exercise his right of recourse against the third party only in separate proceedings.

Actions on a warranty or guarantee are governed by the bilateral Conventions between Belgium and Germany (Article 3 (10)), between France and Belgium (Article 4 (2)), between Belgium and the Netherlands (Article 6 (2)), between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 2 (4)), between Belgium and Italy (Article 2 (10)), and between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 4 (1) (c)), and also by the Benelux Treaty (Article 6 (3)).

This jurisdiction is, in the opinion of the Committee, of considerable importance in commercial dealings, as can be seen from the following example: A German exporter delivers goods to Belgium and the Belgian importer resells them. The purchaser sues the importer for damages in the court for the place of his domicile, for example in Brussels. The Belgian importer has a right of recourse against the German exporter and consequently brings an action for breach of warranty against that exporter in the court in Brussels, since it has jurisdiction over the original action. The jurisdiction over the action on the warranty is allowed by the Convention although the warrantor is domiciled in Germany, since this is in the interests of the proper administration of justice.

However, under Article 17, the court seised of the original action will not have jurisdiction over the action on the warranty where the warrantor and the beneficiary of the warranty have agreed to confer jurisdiction on another court, provided that the agreement covers actions on the warranty.

Moreover, the court seised of the original action will not have jurisdiction over an action on the warranty if the original proceedings were instituted solely with the object of ousting the jurisdiction of the courts of the State in which the warrantor is domiciled (6).

The special position of German law is covered by Article V of the Protocol.

Under this provision, the jurisdiction specified in Article 6 (2) in actions on a warranty or guarantee may not be resorted to in the Federal Republic of Germany, but any person domiciled in another Contracting State may be summoned before the German courts on the basis of Articles 72 to 74 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Judgments given against a guarantor or warrantor in the other Contracting States will be recognized and enforced in Germany.

Judgments given in Germany pursuant to Articles 72 to 74 will have the same effect in the other Contracting States as in Germany.

Thus, for example, a guarantor or warrantor domiciled in France can be sued in the German court having jurisdiction over the original action. The German law

(5) Article 126 (14) of the Code of Civil Procedure.

(6) See Article 181 of the Belgian, French and Luxembourg Code of Civil Procedure, and Article 74 of the Netherlands Code of Civil Procedure.

judgment given in Germany affects only the parties to the action, but it can be invoked against the guarantor or warrantor. Where the beneficiary of the guarantee or warranty proceeds agaist the guarantor or warrantor in the competent French courts, he will be able to apply for recognition of the German judgment, and it will no longer be possible to re-examine that judgment as to the merits.

It is clear that, following the principles which apply to enforcement, a judgment given in an action on a guarantee or warranty will have no effects in the State in which enforcement is sought other than those which it had in the country of origin.

This principle, which already applied under the Conventions between Germany and Belgium (Article 3 (10)) and between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 4 (1) (i)), is thus incorporated in the provision governing relations between the Federal Republic of Germany and the other Member States of the Community.

(b) Third party proceedings

While a third party warranty or guarantee necessarily involves the intervention of an outsider, it seemed preferable to make separate provision for guarantors or warrantors and for other third parties. The simplest definition of third party proceedings is to be found in Articles 15 and 16 of the Belgian Judicial Code, which provides that:

> 'Third party proceedings are those in which a third party is joined as a party to the action.
> They are intended either to safeguard the interests of the third party or of one of the parties to the action, or to enable judgment to be entered against a party, or to allow an order to be made for the purpose of giving effect to a guarantee or warranty (Article 15).
> The third party's intervention is voluntary where he appears in order to defend his interests.
> It is not voluntary where the third party is sued in the course of the proceedings by one or more of the parties (Article 16).'

(c) Counterclaims (Article 6 (3))

The bilateral conventions on enforcement all recognize jurisdiction over counterclaims: see the Convention between Belgium and Germany (Article 3 (1) (10)) (counterclaims); the Convention between Italy and Belgium (Article 2 (1) (10)) (dependent counterclaims); the Convention between France and Belgium (Article 4 (2)) (counterclaims); the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands (Article 6) (counterclaims, third party proceedings and interlocutory proceedings); the Convention between France and Italy (Article 18) (claims for compensation, interlocutory or dependent proceedings, counterclaims); the Convention between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 2 (4)) dependent proceedings, counterclaims); the Convention between Germany and Italy (Article 2 (5)) (counterclaims); the Benelux Treaty (Article 6) (counterclaims, third party proceedings and interlocutory proceedings); and the Convention between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 4 (1) (i)) (counterclaims and actions on a warranty or guarantee).

It has been made clear that in order to establish this jurisdiction the counterclaim must be related to the original claim. Since the concept of related actions is not recognized in all the legal systems, the provision in question, following the draft Belgian Judicial Code, states that the counterclaim must arise from the contract or from the facts on which the original claim was based.

Sections 3 to 5

Insurance, instalment sales, exclusive jurisdiction

General remarks

In each of the six Contracting States, the rules of territorial jurisdiction are not as a rule part of public policy and it is therefore permissible for the parties to agree on a different jurisdiction.

There are, however, exceptions to this principle: certain rules of jurisdiction are mandatory or form part of public policy, either in order to further the efficient administration of justice by reducing the number of jurisdictions and concentrating certain forms of litigation in a single forum, or else out of social considerations for the protection of certain categories of persons, such as insured persons or buyers of goods on instalment credit terms.

In view of the Convention's structure and objectives, it was necessary to deal with this matter under the Convention. Failure to take account of the problem raised by these rules of jurisdiction might not only have caused recognition and enforcement to be refused in certain cases on grounds of public policy, which would be contrary to the principle of free movement of judgments, but also result, indirectly, in a general re-examination of the jurisdiction of the court of the State of origin.

Serveral solutions were open to the Committee.

The first is found in many bilateral Conventions, and enables the court of the State in which recognition or enforcement is sought to refuse to recognize the jurisdiction of the court of the State of origin where, in the former State, there are 'rules attributing exclusive jurisdiction to the courts of that State in the proceedings which led to the judgment' (1).

This system would have been unsatisfactory not only because it gives rise to the objections already set out above, but because it would have introduced into the Convention an element of insecurity incompatible with its basic principles. It is no solution to the problem, and only postpones the difficulties, deferring them until the recognition and enforcement stage.

Another possible solution would have been a general clause like that contained in the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands or the Benelux Treaty (Article 5 (1)), which takes into consideration the internal law of the Contracting States (2). Such a clause could however, lead to difficulties of interpretation, since the court of the State of origin must, where its jurisdiction is contested, apply the internal law of the State which claims to have exclusive jurisdiction.

Moreover, while such a solution might be acceptable in a Treaty between three States, it would be much more difficult to incorporate it in a Convention between six States where it is not always possible to determine in advance the State or States in which recognition or enforcement may be sought.

A third solution would have been to draw up a list of the individual jurisdictions which would be exclusive and which would thus be binding on all the Contracting States. Such a list would answer the need of the parties for information regarding the legal position, allow the court to give judgment on the basis of a definite common rule, remove any element of uncertainty and ensure a balance between the parties to contractual arrangements.

The considerations underlying the various provisions of the Convention are complex. Sections 3 and 4, for example, concerning insurance and instalment sales and loans, are dictated by social considerations and are aimed in particular at preventing abuses which could result from the terms of contracts in standard form.

Section 5 (Article 16) contains a list of situations in which the courts of a Contracting State are acknowledged as having exclusive jurisdiction, since the proper administration of justice requires that actions should be brought before the courts of a single State.

The Convention deals with the two categories differently. The first category has been placed in an intermediate position between the general rules of jurisdiction and the rules which are wholly exclusive.

The following system adopted:

1. For matters falling within Section 3 and 4 there is no single jurisdiction. A choice, albeit a limited one, exists between the courts of different Contracting States where the plantiff is a protected person, that is, a policy-holder, a buyer or a borrower. In matters falling under exclusive jurisdictions pursuant to Section 5, the parties have no choice between the courts of serveral Contracting States.

2. The parties may, in certain circumstances, derogate from the provisions of Sections 3 and 4 (Articles 12, 15, and 18). The provisions of Section 5 may not, however, be derogated from, either by an agreement conferring jurisdiction (second paragraph of Article 17) or by an implied submission to the jurisdiction (Article 18).

3. The rules in Section 3 and 4 are applicable only where the defendant is domiciled in a Contracting State, whereas those in Section 5 apply regardless of domicile.

However, contravention of the provisions of Sections 3 and 4, as well as of those of Section 5, constitutes a ground for refusing recognition and enforcement (Articles 28 and 34).

(1) Convention between Germany and Belgium, Article 3 (2); Convention between Italy and the Netherlands (end of Article 2); Convention between Italy and Belgium (end of Article 2).

(2) Article 5 (1) of the Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands reads as follows: 'Where a domicile conferring jurisdiction has been chosen in one of the two countries for the enforcement of an instrument, the courts for the place of domicile chosen shall have exclusive jurisdiction over litigation relating to that instrument, save for exceptions and modifications enacted or to be enacted under the national law of one of the two States or by international agreement.'

Section 3

Jurisdiction in matters relating to insurance

Rules of exclusive or special jurisdiction relating to insurance exist in France (Article 3 of the Law of 13 July 1930 concerning contracts of insurance), in Belgium (Law of 20 May 1920, added as Article 43 bis to the Law of 25 March 1876 on jurisdiction), in Germany (§ 48 of the Gesetz über den Versicherungsvertrag (Law on contracts of insurance)), and in Italy (Article 1903 (2) of the Civil Code, Article 124 of the Consolidated Law on private insurance). In Luxembourg, the Law of 16 May 1891 on contracts of insurance does not include any provision on jurisdiction. This is due to the small size of the Grand Duchy, which comprises only two judicial arrondissements. However, the Law of 16 May 1891 concerning the supervision of insurance matters governs jurisdiction in regard to foreign insurance companies. This Law requires an insurer resident abroad who is transacting insurance business in the Grand Duchy to appoint a general representative domiciled in Luxembourg who will represent him there judicially and extrajudicially. This representative must give an address for service of process in the judicial arrondissement in which he is not domiciled. Either the domicile of the general representative or his address for service founds jurisdiction in respect of actions arising from contracts of insurance. In the Netherlands, there are no special provisions concerning the jurisdiction of the courts in insurance matters. As regards foreign life-assurance companies, the Netherlands Law of 22 December 1922 recognizes rules analogous to those of the Luxembourg Law of 16 May 1891. The rules are approximately the same in Germany.

Section 3 was drawn up in cooperation with the European Insurance Committee.

The provisions of this Section may be summarized as follows: in matters relating to insurance, actions against an insurer domiciled in a Contracting State may be brought in the following courts, i.e. either:

(i) In the courts of the State where he is domiciled (Article 8), or, subject to certain conditions, in the courts for the place where he has a branch (Articles 7 and 8); or

(ii) (a) in the courts for the place where the policy-holder is domiciled (Article 8);

(b) in the courts of the State where one of the insurers is domiciled, if two or more insurers are the defendants (Article 8);

(c) in the courts for the place where the agent who acted as intermediary in the making of the contract of insurance has his domicile, if there is provision for such jurisdiction under the law of the court seised of the matter (Article 8);

(d) 1. in respect of liability insurance, the insurer may in addition be sued:

(1) in the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred (Articles 9 and 10),

(2) as a third party, in the court seised of the action brought by the injured party against the insured if, under its own law, that court has jurisdiction in the third party proceedings (Article 10);

2. in respect of insurance of immovable property, the insurer may in addition be sued in the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred. The same applies if movable and immovable property are covered by the same insurance policy and both are adversely affected by the same contingency (Article 9).

Where an insurer is the plaintiff, he may in general bring an action only in the courts of the State in which the defendant is domiciled, irrespective of whether the latter is the policy-holder, the insured or a beneficiary.

Agreements conferring jurisdiction which depart from these rules have no legal force if they were entered into before the dispute arose (Article 12).

Article 7

Article 7 specifies that jurisdiction in matters relating to insurance is governed solely by Section 3 of Title II.

Specific exceptions are made by the references to Articles 4 and 5 (5), which concern respectively defendants domiciled outside the Community and disputes arising out of the operations of a branch, agency or other establishment.

It follows from the first of these exceptions that jurisdiction is determined by the law of the court seised of the matter, including the rules of exorbitant jurisdiction, where the defendant, whether he is the insurer or the policy-holder, is domiciled outside the Community. However, as an exception to the general rules of the Convention, an insurer domiciled outside the Community who has a branch or an agency in a Contracting State is, in disputes relating to the operations of the branch or agency, deemed to be domiciled in that State. This exception, which is contained in the last paragraph of Article 8, was adopted because foreign insurance companies can establish branches or agencies in other States only by putting up guarantees which in practice place them in the same position as national companies. However, the exception applies only to branches or agencies, i.e. when the foreign company is represented by a person able to conclude contracts with third parties on behalf of the company.

The second exception again relates to branches or agencies, and also to other establishments, which, as appears from the reference back to Article 5 (5), depend from a company whose seat is in a Contracting State. The result is that such a company may be sued in the courts for the place in which the branch, agency or establishment is situated, in all disputes arising out of their operations.

Article 8

Article 8 lays down general rules of jurisdiction in proceedings instituted against an insurer in matters relating to insurance.

First, the courts of the State where the insurer is domiciled have jurisdiction. This provision determines only general jurisdiction, namely the jurisdiction of the courts of the State where the insurer is domiciled. Each State must then apply its internal law to determine which court has jurisdiction. However, if the insurer is sued outside the State in which he is domiciled, the proceedings must be instituted in a specifically determined court, in accordance with the principles already adopted in Article 5.

Secondly, an action may be brought in a State other than that in which the insurer is domiciled, in the courts for the place where the policy-holder is domiciled. 'Policy-holder' is to be taken to mean the other party to the contract of insurance. Where the insured or the beneficiary is not the same person as the policy-holder, their place of domicile is not taken into consideration. As was noted in particular by the European Insurance Committee, the insurer, as a supplier of services, enters into a business relationship with the other contracting party (the policy-holder). Because of their direct contact it is right and proper that the insurer can be sued in the courts for the place where the policy-holder is domiciled. But it would be unreasonable to expect the insurer to appear in the court of the insured or of a beneficiary, since he will not necessarily know their exact domicile at the time when the cause of action arises.

The domicile of the policy-holder which is relevant here is the domicile existing at the time when the proceedings are instituted.

Thirdly, if two or more insurers are defendants in the same action, they may be sued in the courts of the State where any one of them is domiciled. This provision is identical to that in Article 6 (1), which does not apply here since the Section relating to insurance applies independently of the rest of the Convention.

Furthermore, an insurer may be sued in a State other than that in which he is domiciled, in the courts for the place where the agent who acted as intermediary in the making of the contract of insurance is domiciled, but subject to two conditions: first, that the domicile of the agent who acted as intermediary is mentioned in the insurance policy or proposal, and, secondly, that the law of the court seised of the matter recognizes this jurisdiction. It is not recognized in Belgium or in France, although it is in Germany [1] and in Italy (Article 1903 of the Civil Code). The reference to the insurance proposal takes account of the usual practice in Germany. Insurance companies there in general use data-processing systems, so that the place of the agency often appears in the policy only in the form of a number referring back to the insurance proposal. The insurance proposal, within the meaning of the Convention, means, of course, the final proposal which forms the basis of the contract.

The expression 'the agent, who acted as intermediary in the making of the contract of insurance' includes both an agent through whom the contract was directly concluded between the company and the policy-holder, and also an agent who negotiated the contract to conclusion on behalf of the company. The significance of the last paragraph of Article 8 is made clear in the commentary on Article 7.

[1] § 48 of the Gesetz über den Versicherungsvertrag:
1. If an insurance agent has acted as intermediary in the making of the contract, or has concluded the contract, then in actions against the insurer arising out of the insurance contract the court for the place where, at the time when the contract was negotiated through the agent or concluded, the agent had his agency or, in the absence of an agency, has domicile, shall have jurisdiction.
2. The jurisdiction defined in paragraph 1 may not be excluded by agreement.'

Article 9

Article 9 allows an insurer to be sued in a State other than that in which he is domiciled in the courts for the place where the harmful event occurred, but without prejudice to the application of Article 12 (3). This jurisdiction applies only in respect of liability insurance and insurance of immovable property. It extends to movable property in cases where a building and the movable property it contains are covered by the same insurance policy. This also applies if the movables are covered by an endorsement to the policy covering the immovable property.

Article 10

Article 10 contains rules of special jurisdiction for liability insurance cases. This provision is of particular importance in relation to road accidents.

Under the first paragraph of Article 10, in an action brought by the injured party against the insured, the latter may join the insurer as a third party if the court seised of the matter has jurisdiction in such a case under its own law. This is not possible in the Federal Republic of Germany (1).

The problem arose whether consolidation of the two actions should be allowed even where the insurer and the insured are both domiciled in the same State, which, it must be assumed for the purposes of this argument, is different from the State of the court seised of the matter. For example, where an accident is caused in France by a German domiciled in Germany who is insured with a German company, should third party proceedings, which are recognized under French law, be possible even though the litigation concerns a contract of insurance between a German insured person and a German insurer? As it is subject to German law, should this contract not be litigated in a German court? The contractual relationship between the insurer and the policy-holder would then fall outside the scope of the proceedings relating to personal liability.

While acknowledging the relevance of this question, the Committee was of the opinion that it would be unwise to introduce rules of jurisdiction which would depart from national laws and which could also jeopardize the system in force following the introduction of the green card (2).

The compromise solution adopted by the Committee is to reduce the scope of the first paragraph of Article 10 by inserting, under Article 12 (3), a provision that, if the policy-holder and the insurer are both domiciled in the same Contracting State, when the contract is concluded, they may agree to confer jurisdiction on the courts of that State. Such an agreement must not, however, be contrary to the law of that State.

Under the second paragraph of Article 10 the insurer may also, in respect of liability insurance, be sued directly by the injured party (3) outside the State in which he is domiciled in any court which, under Articles 7 to 9, has jurisdiction over actions brought by the policy-holder against the insurer.

Where, however, under the first paragraph of Article 8, the court for the place where the policy-holder is domiciled has jurisdiction, there is no provision giving jurisdiction to the court for the place where the injured party is domiciled. The phrase 'where such direct actions are permitted' has been used specifically to include the conflict of laws rules of the court seised of the matter (4).

Under the last paragraph of Article 10, the insurer may join the policy-holder or the insured as parties to the action brought against him by the injured party. In the interests of the proper administration of justice, it must be possible for the actions to be brought in the same court in order to prevent different courts from giving judgments which are irreconcilable. This procedure will in addition protect the insurer against fraud (5).

Article 11

Article 11 relates to actions brought by the insurer against the policy-holder, the insured or a beneficiary.

The courts of the State in which the defendant is domiciled when the proceedings are instituted have exclusive jurisdiction.

Again, this is a provision dealing with international jurisdiction; local jurisdiction within each State will be determined by the internal law of that State.

Article 11 does not apply where the defendant is domiciled outside a Contracting State, that is to say, outside the Community. In such cases Article 4 applies.

The second paragraph corresponds to the provisions of Article 6 (3).

Article 12

Article 12 relates to agreements conferring jurisdiction. Agreements concluded before a dispute arises will have no legal force if they are contrary to the rules of jurisdiction laid down in the Convention.

The purpose of this Article is to prevent the parties from limiting the choice offered by this Convention to the policy-holder, and to prevent the insurer from avoiding the restrictions imposed under Article 11.

A number of exceptions are, however, permitted. After a dispute has arisen, that is to say 'as soon as the parties disagree on a specific point and legal proceedings are imminent or contemplated' [1], the parties completely regain their freedom.

Certain agreements conferring jurisdiction which were concluded before the dispute arose are also permissible. First, there are those made to the advantage of the policy-holder, the insured or a beneficiary, which allow them to bring proceedings in courts other than those specified in the preceding Articles.

Certain other agreements conferring jurisdiction are allowed under Article 12 (3), but only in the strictly defined circumstances therein specified which have been explained in the commentary on Article 10.

Section 4

Jurisdiction in matters relating to instalment sales and loans

This Section relates to the sale of goods where the price is payable in a series of instalments, and to the sale of goods where the sale is contractually linked to a loan (Abzahlungsgeschäfte). The rules here adopted are similar to those applicable in the national law of several of the Member States and, like them, stem from a desire to protect certain categories of persons. Article 13 provides that this Section applies independently of the rest of the Convention and, like Article 7, without prejudice to the provisions of Articles 4 and 5 (5).

Article 14 determines the rules of jurisdiction.

In actions against a seller or a lender, proceedings may be instituted by the buyer or borrower either in the courts of the State in which the defendant is domiciled, or in the courts of the State in which the buyer or borrower is domiciled.

Actions by a seller or a lender may in general be brought only in the courts for the place where the buyer or borrower is domiciled when the proceedings are instituted.

The third paragraph, relating to counterclaims, corresponds to Article 6 (3).

Article 15, which relates to agreements conferring jurisdiction, contains under (3) a provision analogous to that of Article 12 (3), but for different reasons. In actions brought by a seller or a lender, it is rather difficult to determine jurisdiction where the buyer or borrower establishes himself abroad after the contract has been concluded. To protect these persons, they should ideally be sued only in the courts of the State where they have established their new domicile. For reasons of equity the Committee has however provided that where a seller and a buyer, or a lender and a borrower, are both domiciled or at least habitually resident in the same State when the contract is concluded, they may confer on the courts of that State jurisdiction over all disputes arising out of the contract, on condition that such agreements are not contrary to the law of that State.

The criterion of habitual residence allows agreements conferring jurisdiction to be concluded even where a buyer or borrower remains domiciled in a Contracting

State other than that in which he is resident. It follows, for example, that a seller or lender need not sue the defendant abroad in the courts of the State in which the defendant is domiciled, if, when the proceedings are instituted, the defendant is still resident in the State in which the contract was concluded.

Section 5

Exclusive jurisdiction

Article 16

Article 16 lists the circumstances in which the six States recognize that the courts of one of them have exclusive jurisdiction. The matters referred to in this Article will normally be the subject of exclusive jurisdiction only if they constitute the principal subject-matter of the proceedings of which the court is to be seised.

The provisions of Article 16 on jurisdiction may not be departed from either by an agreement purporting to confer jurisdiction on the courts of another Contracting State, or by an implied submission to the jurisdiction (Articles 17 and 18). Any court of a State other than the State whose courts have exclusive jurisdiction must declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction (Article 19). Failure to observe these rules constitutes a ground for refusal of recognition or enforcement (Articles 28 and 34).

These rules, which take as their criterion the subject-matter of the action, are applicable regardless of the domicile or nationality of the parties. In view of the reasons for laying down rules of exclusive jurisdiction, it was necessary to provide for their general application, even in respect of defendants domiciled outside the Community. Thus, for example, a Belgian court will not, on the basis of Article 53 of the Law of 1876 or of Article 637 of the draft Judicial Code, which in actions against foreigners recognize the jurisdiction of the courts of the plaintiff, have jurisdiction in proceedings between a Belgian and a person domiciled, for example, in Argentina, if the proceedings concern immovable property situated in Germany. Only the German courts will have jurisdiction.

Immovable property

Under Article 16 (1), only the courts of the Contracting State in which the immovable property is situated have jurisdiction in proceedings concerning rights in rem in, or tenancies of, immovable property.

The importance of matters relating to immovable property had already been taken into consideration by the authors of the Treaty of Rome since, under Article 54 (3) (c) of that Treaty, the Commission and the Council must enable 'a national of one Member State to acquire and use land and buildings situated in the territory of another Member State', in so far as this does not conflict with the principles laid down in Article 39 (2) relating to agricultural policy.

The problems which the Committee faced in this connection did not in fact relate to the recognition and enforcement of judgments, since these questions are governed by the provisions of the conventions already concluded between Member States, all of which apply in civil and commercial matters, including immovable property, but rather to the choice of rules of jurisdiction.

The laws of all the Member States include in this respect special rules of jurisdiction [1] which, generally speaking, have been incorporated in the bilateral conventions, whether they are based on direct [2] or indirect [3] jurisdiction.

However, the rules laid down in the Convention differ from those in the bilateral agreements in that the Convention lays down rules of exclusive jurisdiction. The Convention follows in this respect the Treaty between France and Germany settling the question of the Saar, Article 49 of which provides that the courts 'of the country in which the immovable property is situated shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all disputes regarding the possession or ownership of such property and in all disputes regarding rights in rem in such property'.

As in that Treaty, the exclusive jurisdiction established by Article 16 (1) applies only in international relations; the internal rules of jurisdiction in force in each of the States are thus not affected.

In other words, the Convention prohibits the courts of one Contracting State from assuming jurisdiction in disputes relating to immovable property situated in another Contracting State; it does not, in the State in which the immovable property is situated, prevent courts other than that for the place where the property is situated from having jurisdiction in such disputes if the jurisdiction of those other courts is recognized by the law of that State.

A number of considerations led the Committee to provide a rule of exclusive jurisdiction in this matter. In the Federal Republic of Germany and in Italy, the court for the place where the immovable property is situated has exclusive jurisdiction, this being considered a matter of public policy. It follows that, in the absence of a rule of exclusive jurisdiction, judgments given in other States by courts whose jurisdiction might have been derived from other provisions of the Convention (the court of the defendant's domicile, or an agreed forum) could have been neither recognized nor enforced in Germany or Italy.

Such a system would have been contrary to the principle of 'free movement of judgments'.

The Committee was all the more inclined to extend to international relations the rules of jurisdiction in force in the Federal Republic of Germany and in Italy, since it considered that to do so was in the interests of the proper administration of justice. This type of dispute often entails checks, enquiries and expert examinations which have to be made on the spot. Moreover, the matter is often governed in part by customary practices which are not generally known except in the courts of the place, or possibly of the country, where the immovable property is situated. Finally, the system adopted also takes into account the need to make entries in land registers located where the property is situated.

The wording adopted covers not only all disputes concerning rights in rem in immovable property, but also those relating to tenancies of such property. This will include tenancies of dwellings and of premises for professional or commercial use, and agricultural holdings. In providing for the courts of the State in which the property is situated to have jurisdiction as regards tenancies in immovable property, the Committee intended to cover disputes between landlord and tenant over the existence or interpretation of tenancy agreements, compensation for damage caused by the tenant, eviction, etc. The rule was not intended by the Committee to apply to proceedings concerned only with the recovery of rent, since such proceedings can be considered to relate to a subject-matter which is quite distinct from the rented property itself.

The adoption of this provision was dictated by the fact that tenancies of immovable property are usually governed by special legislation which, in view of its complexity, should preferably be applied only by the courts of the country in which it is in force. Moreover, several States provide for exclusive jurisdiction in such proceedings, which is usually conferred on special tribunals.

Companies and associations of natural or legal persons

Article 16 (2) provides that the courts of the State in which a company or other legal person, or an association of natural or legal persons, has its seat, have exclusive jurisdiction in proceedings which are in substance concerned either with the validity of the constitution, the nullity or the dissolution of the company, legal person or association, or with the decisions of its organs.

It is important, in the interests of legal certainty, to avoid conflicting judgments being given as regards the existence of a company or association or as regards the validity of the decisions of its organs. For this reason, it is obviously preferable that all proceedings should take place in the courts of the State in which the company or association has its seat. It is in that State that information about the company or association will have been notified and made public. Moreover, the rule adopted will more often than not result in the application of the traditional maxim 'actor sequitur forum rei'. Such jurisdiction is recognized in particular in German law and, as regards non-profit making organizations, in Luxembourg law.

Public registers

Article 16 (3) lays down that the courts of the State in which a public register is kept have exclusive jurisdiction in proceedings relating to the validity or effects of entries in that register.

This provision does not require a lengthy commentary. It correspond to the provisions which appear in the internal laws of most of the Contracting States; it covers in particular entries in land registers, land charges registers and commercial registers.

Patents

Article 16 (4) applies to proceedings concerned with the registration or validity of patents, trade marks, designs or other similar rights, such as those which protect fruit and vegetable varieties, and which are required to be deposited or registered.

A draft convention has been drawn up by the EEC countries relating to patent law. The draft includes rules of jurisdiction for the Community patent, but it will not apply to national patents, which thus fall within the scope of the Judgments Convention.

Since the grant of a national patent is an exercise of national sovereignty, Article 16 (4) of the Judgments Convention provides for exclusive jurisdiction in proceedings concerned with the validity of patents.

Other actions, including those for infringement of patents, are governed by the general rules of the Convention.

The expression 'the deposit or registration has been applied for' takes into account internal laws which, like German law, make the grant of a patent subject to the results of an examination. Thus, for example, German courts will have exclusive jurisdiction in the case of an application to the competent authorities for a patent to be granted where, during the examination of the application, a dispute arises over the rights relating to the grant of that patent.

The phrase 'is under the terms of an international convention deemed to have taken place' refers to the system introduced by the Madrid Agreement of 14 April 1891 concerning international registration of trade marks, revised at Brussels on 14 December 1900, at Washington on 2 June 1911, at The Hague on 6 November 1925 and at London on 2 June 1934, and also to the Hague Arrangement of 6 November 1925 for the international registration of industrial designs, revised at London on 2 June 1934. Under this system, the deposit of a trade mark, design or model at the International Office in Berne through the registry of the country of origin has the same effect in the other Contracting States as if that trade mark, design or model had been directly registered there. Thus where a trade mark is deposited at the International Office at the request of the German authorities, the French courts will have exclusive jurisdiction in disputes relating, for example, to whether the mark should be deemed to have been registered in France.

Enforcement of judgments

Article 16 (5) provides that the courts of the State in which a judgment has been or is to be enforced have exclusive jurisdiction in proceedings concerned with the enforcement of that judgment.

What meaning is to be given to the expression 'proceedings concerned with the enforcement of judgments'?

It means those proceedings which can arise from 'recourse to force, constraint or distraint on movable or immovable property in order to ensure the effective implementation of judgments and authentic instruments' (1).

Problems arising out of such proceedings come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts for the place of enforcement.

Provisions of this kind appear in the internal law of many Member States (2).

Section 6

Prorogation of jurisdiction

This section includes Article 17, on jurisdiction by consent, and Article 18, which concerns jurisdiction implied from submission.

Article 17

Jurisdiction deriving from agreements conferring jurisdiction is already a feature of all the Conventions concluded between Member States of the Community, whether the rules of jurisdiction are direct or indirect: see the Convention between France and Belgium (Article 3), and between Belgium and the Netherlands (Article 5); the Benelux Treaty (Article 5); the

(2) See LEREBOURS-PIGEONNIÈRE, Droit international privé, seventh edition, p. 9; LOUSSOUARN, No 411: French courts have exclusive jurisdiction over measures for enforcement which is to take place in France (preventive measures, distress levied on a tenant's chattels, writs of attachment and applications for enforcement of a foreign judgment); over distraint levied on immovable or movable property, and over proceedings concerned with the validity of measures for enforcement.'

Convention between France and Italy (Article 12), between Germany and Italy (Article 2 (2)), between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 2 (2)), between Italy and Belgium (Article 2 (1) (2)), between Germany and Belgium (Article 3 (2)), and between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 4 (1) (b)).

This jurisdiction is also the subject of international conventions, namely the Hague Convention of 15 April 1958 on the jurisdiction of the contractual forum in matters relating to the international sale of goods, and the Hague Convention of 25 November 1965 on the choice of court (1).

It is unnecessary to stress the importance of this jurisdiction, particularly in commercial relations.

However, although agreement was readily reached on the basic principle of including such a jurisdiction in the Convention, the Committee spent much time in drafting Article 17.

Like the draftsmen of the Convention between Germany and Belgium, the report of which may usefully be quoted, the Committee's first concern was 'not to impede commercial practice, yet at the same time to cancel out the effects of clauses in contracts which might go unread. Such clauses will therefore be taken into consideration only if they are the subject of an agreement, and this implies the consent of all the parties. Thus, clauses in printed forms for business correspondence or in invoices will have no legal force if they are not agreed to by the party against whom they operate.'

The Committee was further of the opinion that, in order to ensure legal certainty, the formal requirements applicable to agreements conferring jurisdiction should be expressly prescribed, but that 'excessive formality which is incompatible with commercial practice' (2) should be avoided.

In this respect, the version adopted is similar to that of the Convention between Germany and Belgium, which was itself based on the rules of the Hague Convention of 15 April 1958, in that a clause conferring jurisdiction is valid only if it is in writing, or if at least one of the parties has confirmed in writing an oral agreement (3).

Since there must be true agreement between the parties to confer jurisdiction, the court cannot necessarily deduce from a document in writing adduced by the party seeking to rely on it that there was an oral agreement. The special position of the Grandy Duchy of Luxembourg in this matter necessitated an additional restriction which is contained in the second paragraph of Article I of the Protocol.

The question of how much weight is to be attached to the written document was left open by the Committee. In certain countries, a document in writing will be required only as evidence of the existence of the agreement; in others, however, it will go to the validity of the agreement.

Like the Conventions between Belgium and the Netherlands and between France and Belgium, and also the Benelux Treaty and the Hague Convention, the first paragraph of Article 17 provides that the court agreed on by the parties shall have exclusive jurisdiction. This solution is essential to avoid different courts from being properly seised of the matter and giving conflicting or at least differing judgments. In order to meet practical realities, the first paragraph of Article 17 also covers specifically cases of agreement that a particular court in a Contracting State or the courts of a Contracting State are to have jurisdiction, and is similar in this to the 1958 Hague Convention. As Professor Batiffol pointed out in his report on that Convention, an agreement conferring jurisdiction generally on the courts of a Contracting State 'may have no legal effect if, in the absence of any connecting factor between the contractual situation and the State whose courts have been agreed on as having jurisdiction, the law of that State provides no way of determining which court can or should be seised of the matter' (4). But as Batiffol remarks, this is a matter which the parties should consider at the appropriate time.

The first paragraph of Article 17 applies only if at least one of the parties is domiciled in a Contracting State. It does not apply where two parties who are domiciled in the same Contracting State have agreed that a court of that State shall have jurisdiction, since the Convention, under the general principle laid down in the preamble, determines only the international jurisdiction of courts (see Commentary, Chapter III, Section 1, International legal relationships).

(1) By 1 September 1966 neither of these Conventions had entered into force.

Article 17 applies where the agreement conferring jurisdiction was made either between a person domiciled in one Contracting State and a person domiciled in another Contracting State, or between a person domiciled in a Contracting State and a person domiciled outside the Community, if the agreement confers jurisdiction on the courts of a Contracting State; it also applies where two persons domiciled in one Contracting State agree that a particular court of another Contracting State shall have jurisdiction.

The second paragraph of Article 17 provides that agreements conferring jurisdiction shall have no legal force if they are contrary to the provisions of Article 12 (insurance) or Article 15 (instalment sales), or if the courts whose jurisdiction they purport to exclude have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.

The intention behind the Convention is to obviate cases of refusal of recognition and enforcement on the basis of Articles 28 and 34, and so, as already stated, to promote the free movement of judgments.

The third paragraph of Article 17 provides that if the agreement conferring jurisdiction was concluded for the benefit of only one of the contracting parties, that party shall retain the right to bring proceedings in any other court which has jurisdiction [1]. Agreements conferring jurisdiction cannot of course affect the substantive jurisdiction of the courts.

Article 18

Article 18 governs jurisdiction implied from submission. If a defendant domiciled in a Contracting State is sued in a court of another Contracting State which does not have jurisdiction under the Convention, two situations may arise: the defendant may either, as he is entitled to do, plead that the court has no jurisdiction under the Convention, in which case the court must declare that it does not have jurisdiction; or he may elect not to raise this plea, and enter an appearance. In the latter case, the court will have jurisdiction.

Unlike the case of conventions based on indirect jurisdiction, the defendant may, by virtue of the Convention, rely on its provisions in the court seised of the proceedings and plead lack of jurisdiction. It will be necessary to refer to the rules of procedure in force in the State of the court seised of the proceedings in order to determine the point in time up to which the defendant will be allowed to raise this plea, and to determine the legal meaning of the term 'appearance'.

Moreover, by conferring jurisdiction on a court in circumstances where the defendant does not contest that court's jurisdiction, the Convention extends the scope of Title II and avoids any uncertainty. The main consequence of this rule is that if a defendant domiciled in a Contracting State is, notwithstanding the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 3, sued in another Contracting State on the basis of a rule of exorbitant jurisdiction, for example in France on the basis of Article 14 of the Civil Code, the court will have jurisdiction if this is not contested. The only cases in which a court must declare that it has no jurisdiction and where jurisdiction by submission will not be allowed are those in which the courts of another State have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.

Section 7

Examination as to jurisdiction and admissibility

Article 19

As has already been stated (page 8), a court must of its own motion examine whether it has jurisdiction. Article 19 emphasizes that the court must of its own motion declare that it has no jurisdiction if it is seised of a matter in which the courts of another Contracting State have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.

This rule is essential since the exclusive jurisdictions are conceived to be matters of public policy which cannot be departed from by the free choice of the parties. Moreover, it corresponds to Article 171 of the French Code of Civil Procedure, by virtue of which territorial jurisdiction is automatically examined where the parties are not permitted to reach a settlement [2].

If this Article deserves particular attention, it is mainly because, in order that the general rules of jurisdiction

[1] See also the Conventions between France and Belgium, Article 3, between France and Italy, Article 2, and between Belgium and the Netherlands, Article 5 and the Benelux Treaty, Article 5.

[2] The same is true in the Federal Republic of Germany: see ROSENBERG, op. cit. paragraph 38 (I) (3).

are observed, it grants wide powers to the court seised of the proceedings, since that court will of its own motion have to examine whether it has jurisdiction.

The words 'principally concerned' have the effect that the court is not obliged to declare of its own motion that it has no jurisdiction if an issue which comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of another court is raised only as a preliminary or incidental matter.

Article 20

Article 20 is one of the most important Articles in the Convention: it applies where the defendant does not enter an appearance; here the court must of its own motion examine whether it has jurisdiction under the Convention. If it finds no basis for jurisdiction, the court must declare that it has no jurisdiction. It is obvious that the court is under the same obligation even where there is no basis for exclusive jurisdiction. Failure on the part of the defendant to enter an appearance is not equivalent to a submission to the jurisdiction. It is not sufficient for the court to accept the submissions of the plaintiff as regards jurisdiction; the court must itself ensure that the plaintiff proves that it has international jurisdiction (1).

The object of this provision is to ensure that in cases of failure to enter an appearance the court giving judgment does so only if it has jurisdiction, and so to safeguard the defendant as fully as possible in the original proceedings. The rule adopted is derived from Article 37 (2) of the Italian Code of Civil Procedure, by virtue of which the court must of its own motion examine whether it has jurisdiction where the defendant is a foreigner and does not enter an appearance.

The second paragraph of Article 20 is also designed to safeguard the rights of the defendant, by recognizing the international importance of the service of judicial documents. The service of judicial documents abroad, although governed differently in each of the Member States, can broadly be separated into two main systems. The German system is based on the cooperation of the public authorities of the place of residence of the addressee which have jurisdiction to deliver to him a copy of the instrument. A German court cannot in general give judgment in default of appearance unless it receives conclusive evidence that the instrument has been delivered to the addressee (2) (3). The system contrasts with those in force in Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands (4), all of which are characterized by the 'desire to localize in the territory of the State of the forum all the formalities connected with the judicial document whose addressee resides abroad' (5).

Under the laws of these countries, service is properly effected, and causes time to begin to run, without there being any need to establish that the document instituting the proceedings has actually been served on its addressee. It is not impossible in these circumstances that, in some cases, a defendant may have judgment entered against him in default of appearance without having any knowledge of the action.

The Hague Convention of 1 March 1954 on civil procedure, to which the six Member States are party, does not solve the difficulties which arise under such legislation.

The Committee also tried to solve the problems arising when service is effected late, bearing in mind that the aim of the Convention is to promote, so far as possible, the free movement of judgments.

The search for a solution was obviously helped by the drafting at the tenth session of the Hague Conference on private international law of the Convention on the service abroad of judicial and extrajudicial documents in civil or commercial matters, which was opened for signature on 15 November 1965. This is the reason why the solution adopted in the second paragraph of Article 20 is only transitional.

This provision summarizes Article 15 of the Hague Convention, which is in fact derived from Article 20 of this present Convention, since the work of the Committee served as a basis for discussion at the meetings of the Special Commission which was established by the Hague Conference and which drew up the preliminary draft which was submitted for discussion at the tenth session.

Under the second paragraph of Article 20, where a defendant domiciled in one Contracting State is sued in the courts of another State and does not enter an appearance, the court must stay the proceedings so long as it is not shown that the defendant has been able to receive the document instituting the proceedings in sufficient time to enable him to arrange for his defence, or that all necessary steps have been taken to this end.

This provision is based on the old Article 8 of the Netherlands Law of 12 June 1909, Stb No 141 (1).

The second paragraph of Article 20 requires first that notification of the proceedings has been given to the party who has not entered an appearance, that is either to him in person or at his domicile, and secondly that it has been delivered in sufficient time to enable the defendant to arrange for his defence. It does not require that the defendant should actually have been notified in sufficient time. The defendant must be responsible for any delay caused by his own negligence or by that of his relations or servants. The critical time is thus the time at which service was properly effected, and not the time at which the defendant received actual knowledge of the institution of proceedings.

The question of 'sufficient time' is obviously a question of fact for the discretion of the court seised of the matter.

The court may give judgment in default against a defendant if it is shown that 'all necessary steps have been taken' for him actually to have received in sufficient time the document instituting the proceedings.

This means that a court will be able to give judgment in default against a defendant even if no affidavit can be produced to confirm service on the defendant of the document instituting the proceedings, provided it is shown that all the necessary approaches have been made to the competent authorities of the State in which the defendant is domiciled in order to reach him in sufficient time. Where necessary, it must also be shown that 'all the investigations required by good conscience and good faith have been undertaken to discover the defendant' (2).

As already stated, the second paragraph of Article 20 is only a transitional provision. Under the third paragraph of that Article, where the State of the forum and the State in which the document had to be transmitted have both ratified the new Hague Convention, the court seised of the matter will no longer apply the second paragraph of Article 20 but will be exclusively bound by Article 15 of the Hague Convention. Thus any possibility of conflict between Article 15 of the Hague Convention and the second paragraph of Article 20 of the EEC Judgments Convention is resolved in favour of the Hague Convention.

The Committee also considered it important to ensure certainty and speed in the transmission of judicial documents. In order to achieve this, it considered as a possible solution the transmission of such documents by registered post. However, it did not adopt this system for, although it meets the requirement of speed, it does not offer all the necessary safeguards from the point of view of certainty. In the end the Committee adopted the system which is set out in Article IV of the Protocol.

This Article simply adds a new method of transmission to those already provided for by the Hague Convention of 1 March 1954 on civil procedure, or by the agreements concluded between the Contracting States in application of that Convention. It corresponds, moreover, to the facility provided for by Article 10 (b) of the new Hague Convention.

Under the system adopted in the Protocol, documents can be transmitted by public officers in one Contracting State directly to their colleagues in another Contracting State, who will deliver them to the addressee in person or to his domicile.

According to the assurances which were given to the Committee by a representative of the 'Union internationale des huissiers de justice et d'officiers judiciaires', it will be easy for a public officer in one country to correspond with the appropriate public officer in another country. In case of difficulty it would moreover be possible for the officer in the State in which judgment was given to invoke the assistance of the national associations of public officers, or on the central office of the 'Union' which has its headquarters in Paris.

(1) This Article reads as follows: 'Where the defendant does not enter an appearance, the court may not give judgment in default if the plaintiff does not show that the defendant received the writ of summons. The plaintiff may ask for a new date to be fixed for the hearing.'

(2) Cour d'appel de POITIERS, 9. 7. 1959 (Gazette du Palais, 1959.II.183); cf. GAVALDA, Revue critique de droit international privé, 1960, No 1, p. 174.

In the opinion of the Committee these arrangements meet the requirements of speed and certainty. Direct communication between public officers allows a considerable gain in time by avoiding any recourse to intermediary bodies such as Ministries for Foreign Affairs, Ministries of Justice or prosecutors' offices.

Certainty is further guaranteed since if, for example, the address is incomplete or inaccurate, the officer in the State in which service is to be effected may well be able to undertake investigations in order to find the addressee.

As for the linguistic difficulties which could arise in the context of a grouping of the six countries, these could be overcome by attaching to the instrument a summary in the language of the addressee.

Like Article 10 (b) of the Hague Convention, Article IV of the Protocol allows a Contracting State to object to this method of transmission.

Section 8

Lis pendens — related actions

Article 21

As there may be several concurrent international jurisdictions, and the courts of different States may properly be seised of a matter (see in particular Articles 2 and 5), it appeared to be necessary to regulate the question of lis pendens. By virtue of Article 21, the courts of a Contracting State must decline jurisdiction, if necessary of their own motion, where proceedings involving the same cause of action and between the same parties are already pending in a court of another State. In cases of lis pendens the court is therefore obliged to decline jurisdiction, either on the application of one of the parties, or of its own motion, since this will facilitate the proper administration of justice within the Community. A court will not always have to examine of its own motion whether the same proceedings are pending in the courts of another country, but only when the circumstances are such as to lead the court to belive that this may be the case.

Instead of declining jurisdiction, the court which is subsequently seised of a matter may, however, stay its proceedings if the jurisdiction of the court first seised is contested. This rule was introduced so that the parties would not have to institute new proceedings if, for example, the court first seised of the matter were to decline jurisdiction. The risk of unnecessary disclaimers of jurisdiction is thereby avoided.

Jurisdiction is declined in favour of the court first seised of the matter. The Committee decided that there was no need to specify in the text the point in time from which the proceedings should be considered to be pending, and left this question to be settled by the internal law of each Contracting State.

Article 22

The solution offered by this Article to the problem of related actions differs in several respects from that adopted to regulate the question of lis pendens, although it also serves to avoid the risk of conflicting judgments and thus to facilitate the proper administration of justice in the Community.

Where actions are related, the first duty of the court is to stay its proceedings. The proceedings must, however, be pending at the same level of adjudication, for otherwise the object of the proceedings would be different and one of the parties might be deprived of a step in the heirarchy of the courts.

Furthermore, to avoid disclaimers of jurisdiction, the court may decline jurisdiction only if it appears that the court first seised has jurisdiction over both actions, that is to say, in addition, only if that court has not jurisdiction over the second action. The court may decline jurisdiction only on the application of one of the parties, and only if the law of the court first seised permits the consolidation of related actions which are pending in different courts. This last condition takes into account the specific problems of German and Italian law. In German law, consolidation is in general permitted only if both actions are pending in the same court. In Italian law, the constitution does not permit a court to decide whether it will hear an action itself or refer it to another court. It will, however, always be possible for a German or Italian court which is subsequently seised of a matter to stay its proceedings.

Finally, since the expression 'related actions' does not have the same meaning in all the Member States, the third paragraph of Article 22 provides a definition. This is based on the new Belgian Judicial Code (Article 30).

The Convention does not regulate the procedure for the consolidation of related actions. This is a question which is left to the internal laws of the individual States.

Article 23

This Article deals with a situation which will occur only very rarely, namely where an action comes within the exclusive jurisdiction of several courts. To avoid conflicts of jurisdiction, any court other than the court first seised of the action is required under Article 21 or Article 22 to decline jurisdiction in favour of that court.

Section 9

Provisional and protective measures

Article 24

Article 24 provides that application may be made to the courts of a Contracting State for such provisional measures, including protective measures, as may be available under the internal law of that State, irrespective of which court has jurisdiction as to the substance of the case. A corresponding provision will be found in nearly all the enforcement conventions (1).

In each State, application may therefore be made to the competent courts for provisional or protective measures to be imposed or suspended, or for rulings on the validity of such measures, without regard to the rules of jurisdiction laid down in the Convention.

As regards the measures which may be taken, reference should be made to the internal law of the country concerned.

CHAPTER V

RECOGNITION AND ENFORCEMENT

A. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

As a result of the safeguards granted to the defendant in the original proceedings, Title III of the Convention is very liberal on the question of recognition and enforcement. As already stated, it seeks to facilitate as far as possible the free movement of judgments, and should be interpreted in this spirit. This liberal approach is evidenced in Title III first by a reduction in the number of grounds which can operate to prevent the recognition and enforcement of judgments and, secondly, by the simplification of the enforcement procedure which will be common to the six countries.

It will be recalled that Article 1, which governs the whole of the Convention, provides that the Convention shall apply in civil and commercial matters whatever the nature of the court or tribunal. It follows that judgments given in a Contracting State in civil or commercial matters by criminal courts or by administrative tribunals must be recognized and enforced in the other Contracting States. Under Article 25, the Convention applies to any judgment, whatever the judgment may be called. It also applies to writs of execution (Vollstreckungsbefehl, Article 699 of the German Code of Civil Procedure) (2) and to the determination of costs (Kostenfestsetzungsbeschluß des Urkundsbeamten, Article 104 of the German Code of Civil Procedure) which, in the Federal Republic, are decisions of the registrar acting as an officer of the court. In decisions based on Article 104 of the German Code of Civil Procedure, the costs are determined in accordance with a schedule laid down by law and on the basis of the judgment of the court deciding on the substance of the matter (3). In the event of a dispute as to the registrar's decision, a fully constituted court decides the issue.

(2) The Vollstreckungsbefehl is issued by the court registrar.

(3) See also Article 18 (2) of the Hague Convention of 1 March 1954 on Civil Procedure.

It follows from Article 1 that Title III cannot be invoked for the recognition and enforcement of judgments given on matters excluded from the scope of the Convention (status and legal capacity of persons, rules governing rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship, wills and succession, bankruptcy and other similar proceedings, social security, and arbitration, including arbitral awards).

On the other hand, Title III applies to any judgment given by a court or tribunal of a Contracting State in those civil and commercial matters which fall within the scope of the Convention, whether or not the parties are domiciled within the Community and whatever their nationality.

B. COMMENTARY ON THE SECTIONS

Section 1

Recognition

Article 26

Recognition must have the result of conferring on judgments the authority and effectiveness accorded to them in the State in which they were given.

The words 'res judicata' which appear in a number of conventions have expressly been omitted, since judgments given in interlocutory proceedings and ex parte may be recognized, and these do not always have the force of res judicata. Under the rules laid down in Article 26:

1. judgments are to be recognized automatically;

2. in the event of a dispute, if recognition is itself the principal issue, the procedure for enforcement provided for in the Convention may be applied;

3. if the outcome of proceedings depends on the determination of an incidental question of recognition, the court entertaining those proceedings has jurisdiction on the question of recognition.

The first of these rules lays down the principle that judgments are to be recognized; recognition is to be accorded without the need for recourse to any prior special procedure. It is thus automatic, and does not require a judicial decision in the State in which recognition is sought to enable the party in whose favour judgment has been given to invoke that judgment against any party concerned, for example an administrative authority, in the same way as a judgment given in that State. This provision means that certain legal provisions which in some countries, such as Italy, make the recognition of a foreign judgment subject to a special procedure (dichiarazione di efficacia) will be abolished. The Italian delegation stated that it was able to concur in this solution since the scope of the Convention was limited to matters relating to property rights.

Furthermore, this system is the opposite of that adopted in numerous conventions, according to which foreign judgments are recognized only if they fulfil a certain number of conditions. Under Article 26 there is a presumption in favour of recognition, which can be rebutted only if one of the grounds for refusal listed in Article 27 is present.

The second rule concerns the case where the recognition of a judgment is itself the point at issue, there being no other proceedings involved and no question of enforcement. For example, a negotiable instrument is declared invalid in Italy by reason of fraud. The negotiable instrument is presented to a bank in Belgium. Reliance is placed on the Italian judgment. The bank is faced with two contradictory instruments. The Italian judgment would normally have to be recognized, but it may be that one of the grounds for refusal set out in Article 27 applies. In the event of a dispute it is hardly the task of the bank to decide on the grounds for refusal, and in particular on the scope of Belgian 'international public policy'. The second rule of Article 26 offers a solution in cases of this kind. It allows the party seeking recognition to make use of the simplified procedure provided by the Convention for enforcement of the judgment. There is thus unification at the stage of recognition not only of the legal or administrative procedures which govern this matter in a number of States, but also in those countries which, like Belgium, do not allow actions for a declaration that a judgment is not to be recognized. Only the party seeking recognition may make use of this simplified procedure, which was evolved solely to promote the enforcement of judgments, and hence their recognition. It would moreover be difficult to apply the procedure laid down if the party opposing recognition could also avail himself of it; the latter will have to submit his claims in accordance with the ordinary rules of the internal law of the State in which recognition is sought.

The third rule concerns the case where recognition of a judgment is raised as an incidental question in the course of other proceedings. To simplify matters, the Committee provided that the court entertaining the principal proceedings shall also have jurisdiction on the question of recognition.

It will immediately be noticed that two conditions which are frequently inserted in enforcement treaties are not referred to in the Convention: it is not necessary that the foreign judgment should have become res judicata (1), and the jurisdiction of the court which gave the original judgment does not have to be verified by the court of the State in which the recognition is sought unless the matter in question falls within the scope of Sections 3, 4 or 5 of Title II.

Article 27

Public policy

Recognition may be refused if it is contrary to public policy in the State in which the recognition is sought. In the opinion of the Committee this clause ought to operate only in exceptional cases. As has already been shown in the commentary on Article 4, public policy is not to be invoked as a ground for refusing to recognize a judgment given by a court of a Contracting State which has based its jurisdiction over a defendant domiciled outside the Community on a provision of its internal law, such as the provisions listed in the second paragraph of Article 3 (Article 14 of the French Civil Code, etc.).

Furthermore, it follows from the last paragraph of Article 27 that public policy is not to be used as a means of justifying refusal of recognition on the grounds that the foreign court applied a law other than that laid down by the rules of private international law of the court in which the recognition is sought.

The wording of the public policy provision is similar to that adopted in the most recent conventions (2), in that it is made clear that there are grounds for refusal, not of the foreign judgment itself, but if recognition of it is contrary to public policy in the State in which the recognition is sought. It is no part of the duty of the court seised of the matter to give an opinion as to whether the foreign judgment is, or is not, compatible with the public policy of its country. Indeed, this might be taken as criticism of the judgment. Its duty is rather to verify whether recognition of the judgment would be contrary to public policy.

Safeguarding the rights of the defendant

Where judgment is given in default of appearance, recognition must be refused if the defendant was not duly served with the document which instituted the proceedings in sufficient time to enable him to arrange for his defence. Where judgment is given abroad in default of appearance, the Convention affords the defendant double protection.

First, the document must have been duly served. In this connection reference must be made to the internal law of the State in which the judgment was given, and to the international conventions on the service abroad of judicial instruments. Thus, for example, a German court in which recognition of a Belgian judgment given in default of appearance against a person who is in Germany is sought could, on the basis of the Agreement between Belgium and Germany of 25 April 1959, which was entered into to simplify application of the Hague Convention of 1 March 1954 on civil procedure, refuse recognition if the document instituting the proceedings was sent from Belgium to Germany by registered post, since the Federal Republic of Germany does not permit this method of transmitting documents.

Secondly, even where service has been duly effected, recognition can be refused if the court in which recognition is sought considers that the document was not served in sufficient time to enable the defendant to arrange for his defence.

Looking at the second paragraph of Article 20, which lays down that the court of the State in which judgment is given must stay the proceedings if the document instituting the proceedings was not served on the defendant in sufficient time, it might be assumed that Article 27 (2) would apply only in exceptional cases. It must not be forgotten, however, that the second paragraph of Article 20 requires the court of the State in which judgment is given to stay proceedings only where the defendant is domiciled in another Contracting State.

(1) The condition of res judicata is required by the Conventions between Germany and Italy, France and Italy, and Italy and the Netherlands. It is not required in the Conventions between Belgium and the Netherlands, Belgium and Italy, Germany and Belgium and Germany and the Netherlands, in the Benelux Treaty, or in the application of the Convention between France and Belgium, in spite of the wording of this last Convention (Article 11 (2)).

(2) Conventions between Germany and Belgium, Italy and Belgium; Hague Convention on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in civil and commercial matters.

Incompatibility with a judgment already given in the State in which recognition is sought

There can be no doubt that the rule of law in a State would be disturbed if it were possible to take advantage of two conflicting judgments (1).

The case where a foreign judgment is irreconcilable with a judgment given by a national court is, in the existing conventions, either treated as a matter of public policy (2), as in the Convention between France and Belgium, the Benelux Treaty and the Convention between Belgium and Germany, or is regulated by a special provision.

In the opinion of the Committee, to treat this as a matter of public policy would involve the danger that the concept of public policy would be interpreted too widely. Furthermore, the Italian courts have consistently held that foreign judgments whose recognition is sought in Italy and which conflict with an Italian judgment do not fall within the scope of public policy. This is why the enforcement conventions concluded by Italy always contain two provisions, one referring to public policy, which serves the purpose of providing a safeguard in exceptional cases, and the other whereby the judgment must not conflict with an Italian judgment already given, or be prejudicial to proceedings pending in an Italian court (3).

There are also several other conventions which contain a clause providing for refusal of recognition of a judgment which conflicts with another judgment already given by the courts of the State in which recognition is sought.

In certain conventions, the judgment given in the State in which recognition is sought has to have become res judicata (4), in others it is sufficient for the judgment to be final and conclusive at that stage of procedure (5), and finally there are some which do not regulate the point (6).

The Committee preferred a form of wording which does not decide whether the judgment should have become res judicata or should merely be final and conclusive, and left this question to the discretion of the court in which recognition is sought.

The Committee also considered that, for refusal of recognition, it would be sufficient if the judgment whose recognition was sought were irreconcilable with a judgment given between the same parties in the State in which recognition was sought. It is therefore not necessary for the same cause of action to be involved. Thus, for example, a French court in which recognition of a Belgian judgment awarding damages for failure to perform a contract is sought will be able to refuse recognition if a French court has already given judgment in a dispute between the same parties declaring that the contract was invalid.

The form of words used also covers the situation referred to in Article 5 (3) (c) of the Hague Convention on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments, under which recognition may be refused if the proceedings which gave rise to the judgment whose recognition is sought have already resulted in a judgment which was given in a third State and which would be entitled to recognition and enforcement under the law of the State in which recognition is sought.

It is to be anticipated that the application of the provisions of Title II regarding lis pendens and related actions will greatly reduce the number of irreconcilable judgments.

PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS

Recognition is not to be refused on the sole ground that the court which gave the original judgment applied a law other than that which would have been applicable under the rules of private international law of the State in which recognition is sought. However, the Convention makes an exception for preliminary questions regarding the status or legal capacity of natural persons, rules governing rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship, wills and succession, unless the same result would have been reached by the application of the rules of private international law of the State in which recognition is sought.

The Convention between Belgium and Germany contains a rule which is similar, but confined to cases where the judgment concerns a national of the State in which it is sought to give effect to that judgment. It is pointed out in the report of the negotiators of that Convention that this exception is justified by the fact that States reserve to themselves the right to regulate the status of their nationals. The wording used is similar to that of Article 7 of the Hague Convention on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in civil and commercial matters.

Article 28

The very strict rules of jurisdiction laid down in Title II, and the safeguards granted in Article 20 to defendants who do not enter an appearance, make it possible to dispense with any review, by the court in which recognition or enforcement is sought, of the jurisdiction of the court in which the original judgment was given.

The absence of any review of the substance of the case implies complete confidence in the court of the State in which judgment was given; it is similarly to be assumed that that court correctly applied the rules of jurisdiction of the Convention. The absence of any review as to whether the court in which the judgment was given had jurisdiction avoids the possibility that an alleged failure to comply with those rules might again be raised as an issue at the enforcement stage. The only exceptions concern, first, the matters for which Title II lays down special rules of jurisdiction (insurance, instalment sales and loans) or exclusive rules, and which, as has been shown, are in the six countries either of a binding character or matters of public policy, and, secondly, the case provided for in Article 59; reference should be made to the commentary on that Article.

The second paragraph contains a provision which is already included in a number of conventions (Convention between Germany and Belgium; Hague Convention, Article 9) and avoids recourse to time-wasting duplication in the exceptional cases where re-examination of the jurisdiction of the court of origin is permitted.

The last paragraph of Article 28 specifies that the rules of jurisdiction are not matters of public policy within the meaning of Article 27; in other words, public policy is not to be used as a means of justifying a review of the jurisdiction of the court of origin (1). This again reflects the Committee's desire to limit so far as possible the concept of public policy.

REVIEW AS TO SUBSTANCE

Article 29

It is obviously an essential provision of enforcement conventions that foreign judgments must not be reviewed.

The court of a State in which recognition of a foreign judgment is sought is not to examine the correctness of that judgment; 'it may not substitute its own discretion for that of the foreign court (2) nor refuse recognition' if it considers that a point of fact or of law has been wrongly decided (3).

STAY OF PROCEEDINGS

Article 30

Article 30 postulates the following situation: a party may, in the course of litigation, wish to plead a judgment which has been given in another Contracting State but has not yet become res judicata. In order to remedy the inconvenience which would result if such judgment were reversed, Article 30 allows the court to stay the proceedings upon the principal issue of which it is seised, until the foreign judgment whose recognition is sought has become res judicata in the State in which it was given.

This power does not prevent the court from examining, before staying the proceedings, whether the foreign judgment fulfils the conditions for recognition laid down in Article 27.

Section 2

Enforcement

(a) Preliminary remarks

As has already been shown, the Committee endeavoured to give the Convention a progressive and pragmatic character by means of rules of jurisdiction which break new ground as compared with the enforcement conventions concluded hitherto.

This means, of course, that at the enforcement stage solutions must be found which follow from the rules of jurisdiction.

The progress achieved by Title II of the Convention would be rendered nugatory if a party seeking enforcement in a Contracting State of a judgment given in his favour were impeded by procedural obstacles.

The aim of Title II of the Convention is to strengthen the role of the court of the State in which the judgment was given. It must not be forgotten that that court must declare that it does not have jurisdiction if there are rules of exclusive jurisdiction which give jurisdiction to the courts of another State (Article 19); the court must also declare that it does not have jurisdiction, in cases where the defendant does not enter an appearance, if its jurisdiction is not derived from the Convention (first paragraph of Article 20).

Moreover, the court must stay the proceedings in the absence of proof that the defendant has been able to arrange for his defence (second paragraph of Article 20).

This role, as set out in Title II, is thus of prime importance.

If follows that the intervention of the court in which enforcement is sought is more limited than is usual under enforcement conventions. That court has in practice only two points to examine: public policy and whether the defendant has had the opportunity of defending himself. The other reasons for refusal — conflicting judgments, preliminary questions, review of jurisdiction in relation to certain specific topics — can, in fact, be regarded as akin to public policy. Since, moreover, the Convention is confined to matters relating to property rights, public policy will only very seldom have any part to perfom.

This limitation on the powers of the court in which enforcement is sought led to a simplification of the enforcement procedure. Furthermore, as the position of the defendant in the original proceedings is well protected, it is proper that the applicant for enforcement be enabled to proceed rapidly with all the necessary formalities in the State in which enforcement is sought, that he be free to act without prior warning and that enforcement be obtained without unnecessary complications.

The Committee discussed the enforcement procedure at length before adopting it. There were several possibilities open to it: reference back to national laws but subject to certain rules of the Convention, ordinary contentious procedure, summary contentious procedure or ex parte application.

Each of these solutions had its advantages and disadvantages. The Committee finally adopted a system for the whole Community based on ex parte application. This rapid and simple procedure will apply in all six States.

This uniform solution has the advantage of creating a proper balance as between the various provisions of the Convention: uniform rules of jurisdiction in the six countries and identical procedures for enforcement.

(b) Conditions for enforcement

As has been shown, the Convention is based on the principle that a foreign judgment is presumed to be in order. It must, in principle, be possible to enforce it in the State in which enforcement is sought. Enforcement can be refused only if there is a ground for refusing recognition (1). The foreign judgment must, however, be enforceable in the State in which it was given in order to be enforceable in the State in which enforcement is sought.

(1) On the disadvantages resulting from a difference between the conditions for recognition and for enforcement, see RIGAUX, op. cit., p. 207, No 39.

If a judgment from which an appeal still lies or against which an appeal has been lodged in the State in which it was given cannot be provisionally enforced in that State, it cannot be enforced in the State in which enforcement is sought. It is an essential requirement of the instrument whose enforcement is sought that it should be enforceable in the State in which it originates. As Niboyet points out, there is no reason for granting to a foreign judgment rights which it does not have in the country in which it was given (1).

Under no circumstances may a foreign judgment be reviewed as to its substance (Article 34).

(c) Enforcement procedure

Before examining the Articles of the section on enforcement it seems appropriate to give on outline of the procedure which will be applicable in the six States.

1. The application, accompanied by the documents required under Articles 46 and 47, must be submitted to the authority specified in Article 32. The procedure for making the application is governed by the law of the State in which enforcement is sought.

   The applicant must give an address for service of process or appoint a representative ad litem in the jurisdiction of the court applied to.

2. The court applied to must give its decision without delay, and is not able to summon the other party. At this stage no contentious proceedings are allowed.

The application may be refused only for one of the reasons specified in Articles 27 and 28.

3. If enforcement is authorized:

   (a) the party against whom enforcement is sought may appeal against the decision within one month of service of the decision (Article 36);

   (b) the appeal must be lodged, in accordance with the rules governing procedure in contentious matters, with the court specified in Article 37;

   (c) if an appeal has been lodged against the foreign judgment in the State in which it was given, or if the time for such an appeal has not yet expired, the court seised of the appeal against the decision authorizing enforcement may stay the proceedings or make enforcement conditional on the provision of security (Article 38);

   (d) the judgment given on the appeal against the decision authorizing enforcement may not be contested by an ordinary appeal. It may be contested only by an appeal in cassation (2) (Article 37);

   (e) during the time specified for an appeal against the decision authorizing enforcement, the applicant may take only protective measures; the decision authorizing enforcement carries with it the power to proceed to such measures (Article 39).

4. If enforcement is refused:

   (a) the applicant may appeal to the court specified in Article 40;

   (b) the procedure before that court is contentious, the other party being summoned to appear (Article 40);

   (c) the judgment given on this appeal may be contested only by an appeal in cassation (2) (Article 41).

Article 31

Under this Article 'a judgment given in a Contracting State and enforceable in that State shall be enforced in another Contracting State when, on the application of any interested party, the order for its enforcement has been issued there'.

As can be seen, this provision is almost identical with that contained in the European Convention providing a uniform law on arbitration (3). The Committee did, in fact, take the view that judgments given in one

(1) NIBOYET, Droit international privé français. Vol VI, No 1974.

(2) In the Federal Republic of Germany by a 'Rechtsbeschwerde'.

(3) European Convention providing a uniform law on arbitration, Strasbourg, 20 January 1966. Article 29 of Annex I: 'An arbitral award may be enforced only when it can no longer be contested before arbitrators and when an enforcement formula has been apposed to it by the competent authority on the application of the interested party.'

Contracting State should be enforceable in any other Contracting State as easily as arbitral awards.

The legal systems of the Member States are already familiar with authorization of enforcement by means of an enforcement order. This is so, for example, in the case of judgments and decisions given by the European Community institutions (Article 92 of the ECSC Treaty, Article 192 of the EEC Treaty, Article 164 of the Euratom Treaty). It is also true of judgments and decisions falling within the scope of the Mannheim Convention (1).

The Convention of 30 August 1962 between Germany and the Netherlands also provides that judgments given in one of the two States are to be enforced in the other if enforcement is authorized by means of an enforcement order.

A rule similar to that in Article 31, that is to say an ex parte procedure, was contained in the Franco-German Treaty on the Saar of 27 October 1956. Business circles in the Saar have said that the rule has proved entirely satisfactory.

About 80% of enforcement proceedings have been successfully completed by means of the first ex parte written phase of the procedure. In the majority of cases, judgment debtors have refrained from contesting the proceedings by means of an appeal. This is easily explained by the fact that cases of refusal of enforcement are exceptional, and the risk of having to bear the costs of the proceedings restrains the judgment debtor, unless he feels certain of winning his case.

Article 31 does not purport to determine whether it is the judgment given in the State of origin, or the decision authorizing the issue of the enforcement order, which is enforceable in the State in which enforcement is sought.

The expression 'on the application of any interested party' implies that any person who is entitled to the benefit of the judgment in the State in which it was given has the right to apply for an order for its enforcement.

Article 32

Article 32 specifies the authority in each of the Contracting States to which the application must be submitted and which will have jurisdiction. It was considered to be in the interests of the parties that each relevant authority be indicated in the Convention itself.

The court to which local jurisdiction is given is that for the place of domicile of the party against whom enforcement is sought, or, if that party is not domiciled in the State in which enforcement is sought, the court for the place of enforcement, that is, where the judgment debtor has assets. The jurisdiction of the court for the place of enforcement is thus of minor importance.

The provision requiring applications to be submitted to the court for the place where the judgment debtor is domiciled was included for the following reason. It is quite possible that in the State in which enforcement is sought the judgment debtor may possess property situated in the jurisdiction of different courts. If jurisdiction had been given only to the court for the place of enforcement, a choice between several courts would have been open to the applicant. Thus an applicant who was unsuccessful in one court could, instead of availing himself of the methods of appeal provided for in the Convention, have applied to another court which would not necessarily have come to the same decision as the first court, and this without the knowledge of the other party, since the procedure is ex parte.

Article 33

Under Article 33, the procedure and formalities for making the application are to be governed by the law of the State in which enforcement is sought.

Reference must therefore be made to the national laws for the particulars which the application must contain, the number of copies which must be submitted to the court, the authority to which the application must be submitted, also, where necessary, the language in which it must be drawn up, and whether a lawyer should be instructed to appear.

The provisions to which reference must be made are the following:

Belgium:
The matter will be governed by the Judicial Code (see Articles 1025 and 1027);

Federal Republic of Germany, Netherlands and Italy:
The question will be governed by the law implementing the Convention;

France:
Code of Civil Procedure, Article 1040;

(1) Revised Convention for the Navigation of the Rhine signed at Mannheim on 17 October 1868.

Luxembourg:
A lawyer must be instructed in accordance with the general law under which no one can officially address the court except through an avoué. Article 856 or Article 512 of the Code of Civil Procedure is generally invoked in support of this proposition.

The application must be accompanied by the documents required to be produced under Articles 46 and 47.

In the view of the Committee, if the applicant does not produce the required documents, enforcement should not be refused, but the court may stay the proceedings and allow the applicant time to produce the documents. If the documents produced are not sufficient and the court cannot obtain sufficient information, it may refuse to entertain the application.

Finally, the applicant must, in accordance with the law of the State in which enforcement is sought, either give an address for service of process or appoint a representative ad litem within the area of jurisdiction of the court applied to. This provision is important in two respects: first for communicating to the applicant the decision given on the application (Article 35), and secondly in case the party against whom enforcement is sought wishes to appeal, since such an appeal must be lodged 'in accordance with the rules governing procedure in contentious matters' (Article 37).

The respondent must therefore summon the applicant to appear; the furnishing of an address for service or the appointment of a representative enables the summons to be served rapidly, in accordance with the law of the country in which enforcement is sought, without risk of error and without all the hazards connected with the service of legal documents abroad. It will in fact usually happen that the applicant is domiciled outside the State in which enforcement is sought.

The appointment of a representative ad litem has been provided for because the furnishing of an address for service is unknown in German law.

The two methods will, of course, produce the same result.

Article 34

Article 34 provides that the court applied to shall give its decision without delay; 'the party against whom enforcement is sought shall not at this stage of the proceedings be entitled to make any submissions on the application.'

The Committee considered but rejected the idea of imposing on the court to which application is made a fixed period for giving its decision. Such a time limit is unknown in judicial practice, and there would in any case be no way of enforcing it.

The Convention does not allow the court to which application is made to ask the respondent to make submissions, even in exceptional cases. Such a possibility would have meant that the proceedings were not fully ex parte. Certain courts might be inclined to hear the respondent, which would in fact result in the ex parte procedure systematically becoming inter partes. Moreover, there would be a reduction in the element of surprise which is necessary in an enforcement procedure if the respondent is not to have the opportunity of withdrawing his assets from any measure of enforcement.

The rights of the respondent are safeguarded, since he can institute contentious proceedings by appealing against the decision authorizing enforcement.

As has been shown above, the application may be refused only for one of the reasons specified in Articles 27 and 28, and the foreign judgment may not be reviewed as to its substance. Consequently, fresh claims which have not been submitted to the foreign court are inadmissible; the court seised of the application may authorize or refuse enforcement, but it cannot alter the foreign judgment.

The court may, however, refuse the application if it does not satisfy the requirements of Articles 32 and 33.

Article 35

Article 35 provides that the appropriate officer of the court shall without delay bring the decision given on the application to the notice of the applicant in accordance with the procedure laid down by the law of the State in which enforcement is sought. It is important that the applicant be informed of the decision taken. This demonstrates the value of an address for service or of the appointment of a representative ad litem, particularly where the applicant is domiciled abroad.

The manner in which the decision is communicated to the applicant will be a matter for the national law of the State in which enforcement is sought, irrespective of whether enforcement is authorized or refused.

Article 36

If enforcement is authorized, the decision must be notified to the party against whom enforcement has been granted. That party may appeal against the decision from the time it is served on him. As regards the period within which an appeal may be lodged and the moment from which it begins to run, Article 36 makes a distinction between the following situations:

(a) if the party is domiciled in the State in which the decision was given, the period is one month; the moment from which time begins to run is determined by the law of that State, from which there is no reason to derogate;

(b) if the party is domiciled in another Contracting State, the period is two months, and runs from the date when the decision was served, either on him in person or at his residence (1).

In France and the Netherlands, the day of delivery to the prosecutor's office is not counted for purposes of computation of time. In Belgium, the day of delivery to the postal authorities is not counted (Article 40 of the Judicial Code), nor is the day on which an instrument is dispatched by a Belgian Consul to a foreign authority (2).

The purpose of this rule, which derogates from some national laws, is to protect the respondent and to prevent his being deprived of a remedy because he had not been informed of the decision in sufficient time to contest it.

No extension of time may be granted on account of distance, as the time allowed is sufficient to enable the party concerned to contest the decision, if he is so minded;

(c) if the party is domiciled outside the Community, the period within which an appeal may be lodged runs from the date when the decision is served or is deemed to have been served according to the law of the State in which the decision was given. In this case the period of one month may be extended on account of distance in accordance with the law of that State.

Computation of time is governed by the internal law of the State in which the decision was given.

(1) Service on a party at his residence means delivering the instrument to a person who is present and empowered by law to receive a copy of the instrument or, if there is no such person, to a competent authority.

(2) Belgian Court of Cassation, 4 March 1954; Revue des huissiers de Belgique, May to June 1954, p. 15.

Article 37

Article 37 specifies for each country the court with which an appeal can be lodged.

In that court the proceedings are contentious. Accordingly it is incumbent upon the person against whom enforcement has been authorized to summon the other party to appear.

The court seised of the appeal will have to examine whether it was properly lodged and will have to decide upon the merits of the appeal, taking account of the additional information supplied by the appellant. It will therefore be open to the appellant to establish, in the case of a judgment originally given in default of appearance, that the rights of the defendant were disregarded, or that a judgment has already been given in a dispute between the same parties in the State in which enforcement is sought which is irreconcilable with the foreign judgment. The appellant may also plead Article 38 if he has lodged an appeal against the judgment whose enforcement is sought in the State in which it was given.

It is no part of the duty of the court with which the appeal against the decision authorizing enforcement is lodged to review the foreign judgment as to its substance. This would be contrary to the spirit of the Convention. The appellant could, however, effectively adduce grounds which arose after the foreign judgment was given. For example, he may establish that he has since discharged the debt. As Batiffol points out, such grounds are admissible in enforcement proceedings (3) (4).

The second paragraph of Article 37 provides that the judgment given on the appeal may be contested only by an appeal in cassation and not by any other form of appeal or review.

This rule was requisite for the following reasons. First, the grounds for refusing enforcement are very limited and involve public policy in the State in which enforcement is sought. No useful purpose is served by further argument on this concept. Next, the situation is different from that in which purely national proceedings are involved. The proceedings on the merits of the case itself have already taken place in the State in which the judgment was given, and the Convention in no way interferes with the rights of appeal. It is true that the Convention applies to judgments which are enforceable only provisionally, but in this case the court with which the appeal is lodged may, as provided in Article 38, stay the proceedings. An excessive number of avenues of appeal might be used by the losing party purely as delaying tactics, and this would constitute an obstacle to the free movement of judgments which is the object of the Convention.

Since appeals in cassation are unknown in the Federal Republic of Germany, it has been provided, in order to establish a certain parity amongst the Contracting States, that an appeal on a point of law (Rechtsbeschwerde) shall lie against a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Oberlandesgericht).

Article 38

Article 38 covers cases where an ordinary appeal has been lodged against the judgment in the State in which that judgment was given, and also cases where the period within which such an appeal may be lodged has not yet expired. The court with which the appeal against enforcement under the first paragraph of Article 37 is lodged may either stay the proceedings, authorize enforcement, make enforcement conditional on the provision of such security as it thinks fit, or specify the time within which the defendant must lodge his appeal.

This provision originates in the Convention between Germany and Belgium (Article 10), and its 'object is to protect the judgment debtor against any loss which could result from the enforcement of a judgment which has not yet become res judicata and may be amended' (1).

Article 38 deals only with judgments which, notwithstanding that they may be appealed against, are enforceable in the State in which they were given.

Only the court seised of the appeal has the power to stay the proceedings, and such a stay can be granted only on the application of the party against whom enforcement is sought. This is because that party does not appear at the first stage of the proceedings and cannot be required to do so.

Article 39

Article 39 contains two very important rules. First it provides that during the time specified for the lodging of an appeal the applicant for enforcement may take no enforcement measures other than protective measures — namely those available under the law of the State in which enforcement is sought. Similarly, if an appeal has actually been lodged, this rule applies until the appeal has been determined. Secondly it provides that the decision authorizing enforcement carries with it the power to proceed to any such protective measures. Article 39 also allows the judgment creditor in certain States, for example in the Federal Republic of Germany, to initiate the first phase of the enforcement of the foreign instrument. The object of this provision is to ensure at the enforcement stage a balance between the rights and interests of the parties concerned, in order to avoid either of them suffering any loss as a result of the operation of the rules of procedure.

On the one hand, an applicant who, in consequence of a foreign judgment, is in possession of an enforceable instrument, must be able to take quickly all measures necessary to prevent the judgment debtor from removing the assets on which execution is to be levied. This is made possible by the ex parte procedure and by the provision in Article 39 that the decision authorizing enforcement carries with it the power to proceed to such protective measures. The power arises automatically. Even in those States whose law requires proof that the case calls for prompt action or that there is any risk in delay the applicant will not have to establish that either of those elements is present; power to proceed to protective measures is not a matter for the discretion of the court.

On the other hand, the fact that the enforcement procedure is ex parte makes it essential that no irreversible measures of execution can be taken against the defendant. The latter may be in a position to establish that there are grounds for refusal of enforcement; he may, for example, be able to show that the question of public policy was not examined in sufficient detail. To safeguard his rights it accordingly appeared to be necessary to delay enforcement, which is usually carried out by sequestration of the movable and immovable property of the defendant, until the end of the time specified for appeal (see Article 36) or, if an appeal is actually lodged, until it has been determined. In other words, this is a counterbalance to the ex parte procedure; the effect of the decision authorizing enforcement given pursuant to Article 31 is limited in that during the time specified for an appeal, or if an appeal has been lodged, no enforcement measures can be taken on the basis of that decision against the assets of the judgment debtor.

Articles 40 and 41

These Articles relate to the case where an application for enforcement is refused.

Article 40 provides that the applicant may appeal to the appeal court which has jurisdiction in the State in which enforcement is sought.

The Committee did not think it necessary that the Convention should fix the period within which appeals would have to be lodged. If the applicant has had his application refused, it is for him to give notice of appeal within such time as he considers suitable. He will have regard, no doubt, to the length of time it will take him to assemble all the relevant documents.

Upon appeal the proceedings are contentious, since the party against whom enforcement is sought is summoned to appear. The inter partes procedure is necessary in order to avoid numerous appeals. If the procedure on appeal had remained ex parte, it would have been essential to provide for additional proceedings to enable the defendant to make his submissions if the appellate court were to reverse the decision at first instance and authorize enforcement. The Committee wished to avoid a plethora of appeals. Moreover, the dismissal of the application reverses the presumption of validity of the foreign judgment.

The summoning of the party against whom enforcement is sought is to be effected in manner prescribed by the national laws.

The appellate court can give judgment only if the judgment debtor has in fact been given an opportunity to make his submissions. The object of this provision is to protect the rights of the defendant and to mitigate the disadvantages which result from certain systems of serving instruments abroad. These disadvantages are all the more serious in that a party against whom enforcement is sought and who is not notified in time to arrange for his defence no longer has any judicial remedy against the judgment given on the appeal other than by way of an appeal in cassation, and then only to the extent that this is allowed by the law of the State in which enforcement is sought (Article 41).

Because of the safeguards contained in Article 40, Article 41 provides that the judgment given on the appeal may not be contested by an ordinary appeal, but only by an appeal in cassation. The reason why a special form of appeal (Rechtsbeschwerde) is provided for in the Federal Republic of Germany has already been explained (Article 37).

The procedure for the forms of appeal provided for in Articles 40 and 41 is to be determined by the national laws which may, where necessary, prescribe time limits.

Article 42

Article 42 covers two different situations.

The first paragraph of Article 42 empowers the court of the State in which enforcement is sought to authorize enforcement in respect of certain matters dealt with in a judgment and to refuse it in respect of others (1). As explained in the report annexed to the Benelux Treaty, which contains a similar provision, 'this discretion exists in all cases where a judgment deals with separate and independent heads of claim, and the decision on some of these is contrary to the public policy of the country in which enforcement is sought, while the decision on others is not.'

The second paragraph of Article 42 allows an applicant to request the partial enforcement of a judgment, and ex hypothesi allows the court addressed to grant such a request. As mentioned in the report on the Benelux Treaty, 'it is possible that the applicant for enforcement himself wants only partial enforcement, e. g. where the judgment whose enforcement is sought orders the payment of a sum of money, part of which has been paid since the judgment was given.' (2).

As is made clear in the Conventions between Germany and Belgium, and between Belgium and Italy, which contain similar provisions, the applicant may exercise this option whether the judgment covers one or several heads of claim.

Article 43

Article 43 relates to judgments which order a periodic payment by way of a penalty. Some enforcement conventions contain a clause on this subject (see Benelux Treaty, Article 14; Convention between Germany and the Netherlands, Article 7).

---

(1) See Benelux Treaty (Articles 14 (4)); the Conventions between France and Italy (Article 3); between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 3); between Germany and Belgium (Article 11); between Belgium and Italy (Article 10) and between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 12).

(2) See also the Conventions between Germany and Belgium (Article 11) and between Belgium and Italy (Article 10).

It follows from the wording adopted that judgments given in a Contracting State which order the payment of a sum of money for each day of delay, with the intention of getting the judgment debtor to fulfil his obligations, will be enforced in another Contracting State only if the amount of the payment has been finally determined by the courts of the State in which judgment was given.

Article 44

Article 44 deals with legal aid.

A number of enforcement conventions deal with this matter (1).

The provisions adopted by the Committee supplements the Hague Convention of 1 March 1954 on civil procedure, which has been ratified by the six States, so that a party who has been granted legal aid in the State in which judgment was given also qualifies automatically for legal aid in the State in which enforcement is sought, but only as regards the issuing of the order for enforcement. Thus the automatic extension of legal aid achieved by the Convention does not apply in relation to enforcement measures or to proceedings arising from the exercise of rights of appeal.

The reasoning underlying Article 44 is as follows.

First, as maintenance obligations fall within the scope of the Convention, consideration was given to the humanitarian issues which were the basis for a similar provision in the 1958 Hague Convention.

Above all it must not be forgotten that if a needy applicant were obliged, before making his application for enforcement, to institute in the State in which enforcement is sought proceedings for recognition of the decision granting him legal aid in the State in which the judgment was given, he would be in a less favourable position than other applicants. He would in particular not have the advantage of the rapidity of the procedure and the element of surprise which Title III is designed to afford to any party seeking the enforcement of a foreign judgment.

It is moreover because of this consideration that the automatic extension of legal aid has been limited to the procedure for issuing the order for enforcement, and has not been extended to the proceedings on appeal. Once these proceedings have been set in motion, the applicant for enforcement, or, in case of appeal, the respondent, may, in accordance with the 1954 Hague Convention, take the necessary steps, in the State in which enforcement is sought, to obtain legal aid, in the same way as nationals of that State.

Under Article 47 (2) an applicant must, on making his application, produce documents showing that he is in receipt of legal aid in the State in which judgment was given.

Article 45

This Article deals with security for costs. A similar rule is included in the Hague Convention of 1 March 1954 but as regards the obligation to provide security it exempts only nationals of the Contracting States who are also domiciled in one of those States (Article 17). Under Article 45, any party, irrespective of nationality or domicile, who seeks enforcement in one Contracting State of a judgment given in another Contracting State, may do so without providing security. The two conditions — nationality and domicile — prescribed by the 1954 Convention do not apply.

The Committee considered that the provision of security in relation to proceedings for the issuing of an order for enforcement was unnecessary.

As regards the proceedings which take place in the State in which judgment was given, the Committee did not consider it necessary to depart from the rules of the 1954 Convention.

Section 3

Common provisions

This Section deals with the documents which must be produced when application is made for the recognition or enforcement of a judgment.

Article 46 applies to both recognition and enforcement. Article 47 applies only to applications for enforcement. It should be noted that at the recognition stage there is no reason to require production of the documents referred to in Article 47.

(1) Hague Convention of 15 April 1958 concerning the recognition and enforcement of decisions relating to maintenance obligations towards children (Article 9); Conventions between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 6) and between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 15).

Article 47 (1) provides for the production of documents which establish that the judgment is enforceable in the State in which it was given. The requirement that the judgment be, in law, enforceable in that State applies only in relation to its enforcement (not to its recognition) abroad. (Article 31).

Article 47 (2), which relates to documents showing that the applicant is receiving legal aid in the State in which judgment was given, is also relevant only in enforcement proceedings. The documents are in fact intended to enable a party receiving legal aid in the State in which judgment was given to qualify for it automatically in the proceedings relating to the issue of the order for enforcement (Article 44). However, recognition requires no special procedure (Article 26). If recognition were itself the principal issue in an action, Article 44 and, consequently, Article 47 (2) would apply, since Article 26 refers to Sections 2 and 3 of Title III.

Under Article 46 (1), a copy of the judgment which satisfies the conditions necessary to establish its authenticity must be produced, whether it is recognition or enforcement which is sought.

This provision is found in all enforcement treaties and does not require any special comment. The authenticity of a judgment will be established in accordance with the maxim locus regit actum; it is therefore the law of the place where the judgment was given which prescribes the conditions which the copy of the judgment must satisfy in order to be valid [1].

Under Article 46 (2), if the judgment was given in default, a document which establishes that the party in default was served with the document instituting the proceedings must also be produced.

The court in which recognition or enforcement is sought must, if the foreign judgment was given in default, be in a position to verify that the defendant's right to defend himself was safeguarded.

Article 47 provides that the following documents must be produced:

(a) documents which establish that the judgment is enforceable according to the law of the State in which it was given. This does not mean that a separate document certifying that the judgment has become enforceable in that State is necessarily required. Thus, in France, 'provisional enforceability' would be deduced from an express reference to it in judgments given pursuant to Article 135a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Decisions given in summary proceedings will be provisionally enforceable (Article 809 of the Code of Civil Procedure); and so will decisions in ex parte proceedings (Article 54 of the Decree of 30 March 1808). But whether other judgments are enforceable can be determined only when the date on which they were given has been considered in relation to the date on which they were served and the time allowed for lodging an appeal [2].

Documents which establish that the judgment has been served will also have to be produced, since some judgments may be enforceable and consequently fall within the scope of the Convention even if they have not been served on the other party. However, before enforcement can be applied for, that party must at least have been informed of the judgment given against him and also have had the opportunity to satisfy the judgment voluntarily;

(b) where appropriate, a document showing, in accordance with the law of the State in which the judgment was given, that the applicant is in receipt of legal aid in that State.

Article 48

In order to avoid unnecessary formalities, this Article authorizes the court to allow time for the applicant to produce the documentary evidence proving service of the document instituting the proceedings, required under Article 46 (2), and the documentary evidence showing that the applicant was in receipt of legal aid in the State in which judgment was given (Article 47 (2)).

The court may dispense with the production of these documents by the applicant (the Committee had in mind the case where the documents had been destroyed) if it considers that it has sufficient information before it from other evidence.

The second paragraph relates to the translation of the documents to be produced. Again with the object of simplifying the procedure, it is here provided that the translation may be certified by a person qualified to do so in any one of the Contracting States.

Article 49

This Article provides that legalization or other like formality is not necessary as regards the documents to be produced and, in particular, that the certificate provided for in the Hague Convention of 5 October 1961 abolishing the requirement of legalization for foreign public documents is not required. The same applies to the document whereby an applicant appoints a representative, perhaps a lawyer, to act for him in proceedings for the issue of an order for enforcement.

CHAPTER VI

AUTHENTIC INSTRUMENTS AND COURT SETTLEMENTS

Article 50

In drawing up rules for the enforcement of authentic instruments, the Committee has broken no new ground. Similar provisions are, in fact, contained in the Conventions already concluded by the six States [1], with the sole exception of the Convention between Germany and Italy.

Since Article 1 governs the whole Convention, Article 50 applies only to authentic instruments which have been drawn up or registered in matters falling within the scope of the Convention.

In order that an authentic instrument which has been drawn up or registered in one Contracting State may be the subject of an order for enforcement issued in another Contracting State, three conditions must be satisfied:

(a) the instrument must be enforceable in the State in which it was drawn up or registered;

(b) it must satisfy the conditions necessary to establish its authenticity in that State;

(c) its enforcement must not be contrary to public policy in the State in which enforcement is sought.

The provisions of Section 3 of Title III are applicable as appropriate. It follows in particular that no legalization or similar formality is required.

Article 51

A provision covering court settlements was considered necessary on account of the German and Netherlands legal systems [2], under German and Netherlands law, settlements approved by a court in the course of proceedings are enforceable without further formality (Article 794 (1) of the German Code of Civil Procedure, and Article 19 of the Netherlands Code of Civil Procedure).

The Convention, like the Convention between Germany and Belgium, makes court settlements subject to the same rules as authentic instruments, since both are contractual in nature. Enforcement can therefore be refused only if it is contrary to public policy in the State in which it is sought.

CHAPTER VII

GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 52

As regards the determination of domicile (Article 52), reference should be made to Chapter IV (A) (3) which deals with the matter.

Article 53

Article 53 provides that, for the purposes of this Convention, the seat of a company or other legal person or association of natural or legal persons shall be treated as its domicile.

The Convention does not define what is meant by the seat of a legal person or of a company or association of natural or legal persons any more than it defines domicile.

In determining the location of the seat, the court will apply its rules of private international law. The Committee did not think it possible to particularize the concept of seat in any other way, and considered that it could not be achieved by making a reference to Article 52, in view of the different approaches which the various Member States of the Community adopt in this matter. Moreover, the Committee did not wish to encroach upon the work on company law which is now being carried out within the Community.

It did not excape the attention of the Committee that the application of Article 16 (2) of the Convention could raise certain difficulties. This would be the case, for example, where a court in one State ordered the dissolution of a company whose seat was in that State and application was then made for recognition of that order in another State under whose law the location of the company's seat was determined by its statutes, if, when so determined, it was in that other State. In the opinion of the Committee, the court of the State in which recognition were sought would be entitled, under the first paragraph of Article 28, to refuse recognition on the ground that the courts of that State had exclusive jurisdiction.

Article 53 does not deal with the preliminary question of the recognition of companies or other legal persons or associations of natural or legal persons; this must be resolved either by national law or by the Hague Convention of 1 June 1956 on the recognition of the legal personality of companies, firms, associations and foundations (1), pending the entry into force of the Convention which is at present being prepared within the EEC on the basis of Article 220 of the Treaty of Rome.

Article 53 refers to companies or other legal persons and to associations of natural or legal persons; to speak only of legal persons would have been insufficient, since this expression would not have covered certain types of company, such as the 'offene Handelsgesellschaft' under German law, which are not legal persons. Similarly, it would not have been sufficient to speak only of companies, since certain bodies, such as associations and foundations, would then not have been covered by this Convention.

(1) Ratified on 20 April 1966 by Belgium, France and the Netherlands.

CHAPTER VIII

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

Article 54

As a general rule, enforcement treaties have no retroactive effect (1), in order 'not to alter a state of affairs which has been reached on the basis of legal relations other than those created between the two States as a result of the introduction of the Convention' (2).

So far as the author is aware only the Benelux Treaty applies to judgments given before its entry into force.

(1) Conventions between France and Belgium (Article 19); between Belgium and the Netherlands (Article 27); between Germany and Belgium (Article 17); between Germany and Italy (Article 18); between Germany and the Netherlands (Article 20); between Italy and Belgium (Article 17); and between Italy and the Netherlands (Article 16).

(2) See Report of the negotiators of the Convention between Germany and Belgium.

A solution as radical as that of the Benelux Treaty did not seem acceptable. In the first place, the conditions which a judgment must fulfil in order to be recognized and enforced are much stricter under the Benelux Treaty (Article 13) than under the EEC Convention. Secondly, the ease with which recognition and enforcement can be granted under the EEC Convention is balanced by the provisions of Title II which safeguard the interests of the defendant. In particular, those provisions have made it possible, at the stage of recognition or enforcement, to dispense with any review of the jurisdiction of the court of origin (Article 28). But, of course, a defendant in the State in which judgment was originally given will be able to rely on these protective provisions only when the Convention has entered into force. Only then will he be able to invoke the Convention to plead lack of jurisdiction.

Although Article 54 was not modelled on the Benelux Treaty, its effect is not very different.

The rules adopted are as follows:

1. The Convention applies to proceedings which are instituted — and in which, therefore, judgment is given — after the entry into force of the Convention.

2. The Convention does not apply if the proceedings were instituted and judgment given before the entry into force of the Convention.

3. The Convention does apply, but subject to certain reservations, to judgments given after its entry into force in proceedings instituted before its entry into force.

In this case, the court of the State addressed may review the jurisdiction of the court of origin, since the defendant originally had no opportunity to contest that jurisdiction in that court on the basis of the Convention.

Enforcement will be authorized if the jurisdiction of the court of origin:

(i) either was based on a rule which accords with one of the rules of jurisdiction in the Convention; for example, if the defendant was domiciled in the State in which the judgment was given;

(ii) or was based on a multilateral or bilateral convention in force between the State of origin and the State addressed. Thus if, for example, an action relating to a contract were brought in a German court, the judgment given could be recognized and enforced in Belgium if the obligation had been or was to be performed in the Federal Republic since the jurisdiction of the German court would be founded on Article 3 (1) (5) of the Convention between Germany and Belgium.

If the jurisdiction of the court of origin is founded on one of those bases, the judgment must be recognized and enforced, provided of course that there is no ground for refusal under Article 27 or 28. Recognition will be accorded without any special procedure being required (Article 26); enforcement will be authorized in accordance with the rules of Section 2 of Title III, that is to say, on ex parte application.

It follows from Article 54, which provides that the Convention applies only to legal proceedings instituted after its entry into force, that the Convention will have no effect on proceedings in progress at the time of its entry into force. If, for example, before the entry into force of the Convention, proceedings were instituted in France in accordance with Article 14 of the Civil Code against a person domiciled in another Contracting State, that person could not plead the Convention for the purpose of contesting the jurisdiction of the French court.

CHAPTER IX

RELATIONSHIP TO OTHER INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS

Title VII deals with the relationship between the Convention and other international instruments governing jurisdiction, recognition and the enforcement of judgments. It covers the following matters:

1. the relationship between the Convention and the bilateral agreements already in force between certain Member States of the Community (Article 55 and 56) (1):

2. the relationship between the Convention and those international agreements which, in relation to particlar matters, govern — or will govern — jurisdiction and the recognition or enforcement of judgments (Article 57);

3. the relationship between the Convention and the Convention of 15 June 1869 between France and Switzerland, which is the only enforcement convention concluded between a Member State of the EEC and a non-member State to contain rules of direct jurisdiction (Article 58);

4. the relationship between the Convention and any other instruments, whether bilateral or multilateral, which may in the future govern the recognition and enforcement of judgments (Article 59).

It was not thought necessary to regulate the relationship between the Convention and the bilateral conventions already concluded between Member States of the EEC and non-member States since, with the exception of the Convention between France and Switzerland, such conventions all contain rules of indirect jurisdiction. There is, therefore, no conflict between those conventions and the rules of jurisdiction laid down in Title II of the Convention. Recognition and enforcement would seem to raise no problem, since judgments given in those non-member States must be recognized in accordance with the provisions of the bilateral conventions.

Articles 55 and 56

Article 55 contains a list of the Conventions which will be superseded on the entry into force of the EEC Convention. This will, however, be subject to:

1. the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 54, as explained in the commentary on that Article;

2. the provisions of the first paragraph of Article 56, the consequence of which is that these conventions will continue to have effect in relation to matters to which the EEC Convention does not apply (status, legal capacity etc.);

3. the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 56 concerning the recognition and enforcement of judgments given before the EEC Convention enters into force. Thus a judgment given in France before the EEC Convention enters into force and to which by virtue of Article 54 this Convention would therefore not apply, could be recognized and enforced in Italy after the entry into force of the EEC Convention under the terms of the Convention of 3 June 1930 between France and Italy. Without such a rule, judgments given before the Convention enters into force could be recognized and enforced only in accordance with the general law, and this would in several Contracting States involve the possibility of a review of the substance of the judgment, which would unquestionably be a retrograde step.

Article 57

The Member States of the Community, or some of them, are already parties to numerous international agreements which, in relation to particular matters, govern jurisdiction or the recognition or enforcement of judgments. Those agreements include the following:

1. The revised Convention for the navigation of the Rhine signed at Mannheim on 17 October 1868 (2);

2. The International Convention for the unification of certain rules relating to international carriage by air, and Additional Protocol, signed at Warsaw on 12 October 1929 (3);

3. The International Convention on certain rules concerning civil jurisdiction in matters of collision, signed at Brussels on 10 May 1952 (4);

4. The International Convention relating to the arrest of sea-going ships, signed at Brussels on 10 May 1952 (5);

5. The Convention on damage caused by foreign aircraft to third parties on the surface, signed at Rome on 7 October 1952 (6);

(1) Mention has been made of the Benelux Treaty although, as it has not been ratified by Luxembourg, it has not yet entered into force; this is to avoid any conflict between the Convention and that Treaty should it enter into force.

(2) These Conventions have been ratified by the following Member States of the European Economic Community (list drawn up on 15 September 1966): Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France and the Netherlands.

(3) Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

(4) Belgium and France.

(5) Belgium and France.

(6) Belgium and Luxembourg.

6. The International Convention concerning the carriage of goods by rail (CIM), and Annexes, signed at Berne on 25 October 1952 (1);

7. The International Convention concerning the carriage of passengers and luggage by rail (CIV) and Annexes, signed at Berne on 25 October 1952 (2);

8. The Agreement on German external debts, signed at London on 27 February 1953 (2);

9. The Convention on civil procedure concluded at The Hague on 1 March 1954 (3);

10. The Convention on the contract for the International carriage of goods by road (CMR) and Protocol of Signature, signed at Geneva on 19 May 1956 (3);

11. The Convention concerning the recognition and enforcement of decisions relating to maintenance obligations in respect of children, concluded at The Hague on 15 April 1958 (4);

12. The Convention on the jurisdiction of the contractual forum in matters relating to the international sale of goods, concluded at The Hague on 15 April 1958 (5);

13. The Convention on third party liability in the field of nuclear energy, signed at Paris on 29 July 1960 (6a), and the Additional Protocol, signed at Paris on 28 January 1964 (6b), the Supplementary Convention to the Paris Convention of 29 July 1960, and Annex, signed at Brussels on 31 January 1963 (6c), and Additional Protocol to the Supplementary Convention signed at Paris on 28 January 1964 (6d).

14. The Convention on the liability of operators of nuclear ships, and Additional Protocol, signed at Brussels on 25 May 1962 (7);

15. The Convention of 27 October 1956 between the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, the Federal Republic of Germany and the French Republic on the canalization of the Moselle (8).

(1) Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.
(2) Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.
(3) The six States.
(4) Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy and the Netherlands.
(5) Italy.
(6) (a) and (b) France and Belgium; (c) and (d) France.
(7) Not ratified.
(8) Ratified by the three States concerned.

The structure of these agreements varies considerably. Some of them govern only jurisdiction, like the Warsaw Convention of 12 October 1929 for the unification of certain rules relating to international carriage by air, or are based on indirect jurisdiction, like the Hague Convention of 15 April 1958 concerning the recognition and enforcement of decisions relating to maintenance obligations in respect of children, or contain rules of direct or even exclusive jurisdiction, such as the International Convention of 25 October 1952 concerning the carriage of goods by rail (CIM), which lays down in Article 43 (5) that actions arising from the contract of carriage may be brought only in the courts of the State to which the defendant railway belongs.

The approach adopted by the Committee means that agreements relating to particular matters prevail over the Convention. It follows that, where those agreements lay down rules of direct or exclusive jurisdiction, the court of the State of origin will have to apply those rules to the exclusion of any others; where they contain provisions concerning the conditions governing the recognition and enforcement of judgments given in matters to which the agreements apply, only those conditions need be satisfied, so that the enforcement procedure set up by the EEC Convention will not apply to those judgments.

The Committee adopted this approach in view of the fact that the Member States of the Community, when they entered into these agreements, had for the most part contracted obligations towards non-Member States which should not be modified without the consent of those States.

Moreover, the following points must be borne in mind:

1. The rules of jurisdiction laid down in these agreements have been dictated by particular considerations relating to the matters of which they treat, e. g. the flag or port of registration of a vessel in the maritime conventions; the criterion of domicile is not often used to establish jurisdiction in such agreements.

2. The EEC Convention lays down that judgments are in principle to be recognized, whereas agreements relating to particular matters usually subject the recognition and enforcement of judgments to a certain number of conditions. These conditions may well differ from the grounds for refusal set out in Articles 27 and 28; moreover they usually include a requirement, which the Convention has dropped, that the court of origin had jurisdiction.

3. The simplified enforcement procedure laid down by the Convention is the counterpart of Title II, the provisions of which will not necessarily have to be observed where the court of the State of origin has to apply another convention. Consequently, where agreements relating to particular matters refer for the enforcement procedure back to the ordinary law of the State in which enforcement is sought, it is that law which must be applied. There is, however, nothing to prevent a national legislature from substituting the Convention procedure for its ordinary civil procedure for the enforcement of judgments given in application of agreements governing particular matters.

Article 58

This Article deals only with certain problems of jurisdiction raised by the Convention of 15 June 1869 between France and Switzerland.

Under Article 1 of that Convention, a Swiss national domiciled in France may sue in the French courts a French national domiciled in a third State.

This option, granted by that Convention to Swiss nationals domiciled in France, might, in the absence of Article 58, conflict with the EEC Convention, according to which a defendant domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued in the courts of another Contracting State only in certain defined situations, and in any case not on the basis of rules of exorbitant jurisdiction such as those of Article 14 of the French Civil Code.

Under Article 58, a Swiss national domiciled in France can exercise the option which the Convention between France and Switzerland grants him to sue in France a Frenchman domiciled in another Contracting State, without there being any conflict with the EEC Convention, since the jurisdiction of the French Court will be recognized under the terms of Article 58. As a result of this provision, the rights secured by Swiss nationals domiciled in France are safeguarded, and France can continue to honour the obligations which it has entered into with respect to Switzerland. This is, of course, only an option which is granted to Swiss nationals, and there is nothing to prevent them from making use of the other provisions of the EEC Convention.

Article 59

It will be recalled that under Article 3 of the Convention, what are known as the rules of 'exorbitant' jurisdiction are no longer to be applied in cases where the defendant is domiciled in the Community, but that under Article 4 they are still fully applicable where the defendant is domiciled outside the Community, and that, in such cases, judgments given by a court whose jurisdiction derives from those rules are to be recognized and enforced in the other Contracting States.

It must first be stressed that Article 59 does not reduce the effect of Article 4 of the Convention, for the latter Article does not prevent a State, in an agreement with a third State, from renouncing its rules of exorbitant jurisdiction either in whole or only in certain cases, for example, if the defendant is a national of that third State or if he is domiciled in that State. Each State party to the EEC Convention remains quite free to conclude agreements of this type with third States, just as it is free to amend the provisions of its legislation which contain rules of exorbitant jurisdiction; Article 4 of the Convention imposes no common rule, but merely refers back to the internal law of each State.

The only objective of Article 59 is to lessen the effects, within the Community, of judgments given on the basis of rules of exorbitant jurisdiction. Under the combined effect of Articles 59 and 28, recognition or enforcement of a judgment given in a State party to the Convention can be refused in any other Contracting State:

1. where the jurisdiction of the court of origin could only be based on one of the rules of exorbitant jurisdiction specified in the second paragraph of Article 3. It would therefore be no ground for refusal that the court of origin founded its jurisdiction on one of those rules, if it could equally well have founded its jurisdiction on other provisions of its law. For example, a judgment given in France on the basis of Article 14 of the Civil Code could be recognized and enforced if the litigation related to a contract which was to be performed in France;

2. where a convention on the recognition and enforcement of judgments exists between the State addressed and a third State, under the terms of which judgments given in any other State on the basis of a rule of exorbitant jurisdiction will be neither recognized nor enforced where the defendant was domiciled or habitually resident in the third State. Belgium would thus not be obliged to recognize or enforce a judgment given in France against a person domiciled or habitually resident in Norway where the jurisdiction of the French courts over that person could be based only on Article 14 of the Civil Code since a convention between Belgium and Norway exists under which those two countries undertook not to recognize or enforce such judgments. Article 59 includes a reference not only to the defendant's domicile but also to his habitual residence, since in many non-member States this criterion is in practice equivalent to the concept of domicile as this is understood in the Member States of the Community (see also Article 10 (1)) of the Hague Convention on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in civil and commercial matters).

As regards the recognition and enforcement of judgments. Article 59 thus opens the way towards regulating the relations between the Member States of the EEC and other States, in particular the increasing number which are members of the Hague Conference. This seemed to justify a slight encroachment on the principle of free movement of judgments.

CHAPTER X

FINAL PROVISIONS

Articles 60 to 62 and 64 to 68

These Articles give rise to no particular comment.

Article 63

Article 63 deals with the accession of new Member States to the European Economic Community.

It is desirable, in the opinion of the Committee, that, in order to be able to fulfil the obligations laid down in Article 220 of the Treaty establishing the European Economic Community, such States should accede to the Convention. The legal systems of such States might, however, prevent the acceptance of the Convention as it stands, and negotiations might be necessary. If such were the case, any agreement concluded between the Six and a new Member State should not depart from the basic principles of the Convention. That is why Article 63 provides that the Convention must be taken as a basis for the negotiations, which should be concerned only with such adjustments as are essential for the new Member State to be able to accede to the Convention.

The negotiations with that State would not necessarily have to precede its admission to the Community.

Since the adjustments would be the subject of a special agreement between the Six and the new Member State, it follows from the second paragraph of Article 63 that these negotiations could not be used as an opportunity for the Six to reopen debate on the Convention.

CHAPTER XI

PROTOCOL

Article I

Article I of the Protocol takes account of the special position of the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg. It provides that any person domiciled in Luxembourg who is sued in a court of another Contracting State pursuant to Article 5 (1) (which provides, in matters relating to a contract, that the courts for the place of performance of the obligation shall have jurisdiction), may refuse the jurisdiction of those courts. A similar reservation is included in the Benelux Treaty (Protocol, Article I), and it is justified by the particular nature of the economic relations between Belgium and Luxembourg, in consequence of which the greater part of the contractual obligations between persons resident in the two countries are performed or are to be performed in Belgium. It follows from Article 5 (1) that a plaintiff domiciled in Belgium could in most cases bring an action in the Belgian courts.

Another characteristic of Luxembourg economic relations is that a large number of the contracts concluded by persons resident in Luxembourg are international contracts. In view of this, it was clearly necessary that agreements conferring jurisdiction which could be invoked against persons domiciled in Luxembourg should be subject to stricter conditions than those of Article 17. The text adopted is based on that of the Benelux Treaty (Article 5 (3)).

Article II

Article II of the Protocol also has its origin in the Benelux Treaty. The latter applies inter alia to judgments given in civil matters by criminal courts, and thus puts an end to a controversy between Belgium and the Netherlands on the interpretation of the 1925 Convention between Belgium and the Netherlands. As the report annexed to the Treaty explains [1], the reluctance of the Netherlands authorities to enforce judgments given by foreign criminal courts in civil claims is due to the fact that a Netherlander charged with a punishable offence committed in a foreign country may be obliged to appear in person before the foreign criminal court in order to defend himself even in relation to the civil claim, although the Netherlands does not extradite its nationals. This objection is less pertinent than would appear at first sight under certain systems of law, and in particular in France, Belgium and Luxembourg, the judgment in a criminal case has the force of res judicata in any subsequent civil action.

In view of this, the subsequent civil action brought against a Netherlander convicted of a criminal offence will inevitably go against him. It is therefore essential that he should be able to conduct his defence during the criminal stage of the proceedings.

For this reason the Convention, like the Benelux Treaty, provides (see the Protocol) that a person domiciled in a Contracting State may arrange for his defence in the criminal courts of any other Contracting State.

Under Article II of the Protocol, that person will enjoy this right even if he does not appear in person and even if the code of criminal procedure of the State in question does not allow him to be represented. However, if the court seised of the matter should specifically order appearance in person, the judgment given without the person concerned having had the opportunity to arrange for his defence, because he did not appear in person, need not be recognized or enforced in the other Contracting States.

This right is, however, accorded by Article II of the Protocol only to persons who are prosecuted for an offence which was not intentionally committed; this includes road accidents.

Article III

This Article is also based on the Benelux Treaty (Article III of the Protocol).

It abolishes the levying, in the State in which enforcement is sought, of any charge, duty or fee which is calculated by reference to the value of the matter in issue, and seeks to remedy the distortion resulting from the fact that enforcement gives rise to the levying of fixed fees in certain countries and proportional fees in others.

This Article is not concerned with lawyers' fees.

In the opinion of the Committee, while it was desirable to abolish proportional fees on enforcement, there was no reason to suppress the fixed charges, duties and fees which are payable, even under the internal laws of the Contracting States, whenever certain procedural acts are performed, and which in some respects can be regarded as fees charged for services rendered to the parties.

Article V

(See the commentary on Article 6 (2), page 27 et seq.)

Article VI

This Article relates to the case where legislative amendments to national laws affect either the provisions of the laws mentioned in the Convention — as might happen in the case of the provisions specified in the second paragraph of Article 3 — or affect the courts listed in Section 2 of Title III. Information on these matters must be passed to the Secretary General of the Council of the European Communities to enable him, in accordance with Article 64 (e), to notify the other Contracting States.

Protocol on the interpretation of the 1968 Convention by the Court of Justice (consolidated version)

Protocol on the interpretation of the 1968 Convention by the Court of Justice (consolidated version)

PRELIMINARY NOTE

The signing on 29 November 1996 of the Convention on the accession of the Republic of Austria, the Republic of Finland and the Kingdom of Sweden to the Brussels Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters and to the Protocol on its interpretation by the Court of Justice has made it desirable, as with previous accessions, for legal practitioners to be provided with an up-to-date consolidated version of the texts of the Brussels Convention and of that Protocol published in Official Journal of the European Communities C 189 of 28 July 1990.

These texts are accompanied by three Declarations by the representatives of the Governments of the Member States, one made in 1978 in connection with the International Convention relating to the arrest of sea-going ships, another in 1989 concerning the ratification of the Convention on the accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic and the last in 1996 on jurisdiction for cases where, in the framework of the provision of services, workers are posted in a Member State other than that in which their work is normally performed.

The text printed in this edition was drawn up by the General Secretariat of the Council, in whose archives the originals of the instruments concerned are deposited. It should be noted, however, that this text has no binding force. The official texts of the instruments consolidated are to be found in the following Official Journals.

September 1968 on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters,

Desiring to ensure that the provisions of that Protocol are applied as effectively and as uniformly as possible,

JOINT DECLARATION of 9 October 1978

THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE MEMBER STATES OF THE EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY, MEETING WITHIN THE COUNCIL, Desiring to ensure that in the spirit of the Convention of 27 September 1968 uniformity of jurisdiction should also be achieved as widely as possible in maritime matters,

Considering that the International Convention relating to the arrest of sea-going ships, signed at Brussels on 10 May 1952, contains provisions relating to such jurisdiction,

Considering that all of the Member States are not parties to the said Convention,

Express the wish that Member States which are coastal States and have not already become parties to the Convention of 10 May 1952 should do so as soon as possible.

In witness whereof, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries have affixed their signature below this Joint Declaration.

Done at Luxembourg on the ninth day of October in the year one thousand nine hundred and seventy-eight.

[Signatures of the plenipotentiaries]

JOINT DECLARATION of 26 May 1989 concerning the ratification of the Convention on the accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic to the 1968 Brussels Convention

Upon signature of the Convention on the accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic to the 1968 Brussels Convention, done at Donostia - San Sebastian on 26 May 1989,

THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE MEMBER STATES OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES, MEETING WITHIN THE COUNCIL,

DESIROUS that, in particular with a view to the completion of the internal market, application of the Brussels Convention and of the 1971 Protocol should be rapidly extended to the entire Community,

WELCOMING the conclusion on 16 September 1988 of the Lugano Convention which extends the principles of the Brussels Convention to those States becoming parties to the Lugano Convention, designed principally to govern relations between the Member States of the European Economic Community (EEC) and those of the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) with regard to the legal protection of persons established in any of those States and to the simplification of formalities for the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments,

CONSIDERING that the Brussels Convention has as its legal basis Article 220 of the Treaty of Rome and is interpreted by the Court of Justice of the European Communities,

MINDFUL that the Lugano Convention does not affect the application of the Brussels Convention as regards relations between Member States of the European Economic Community, since such relations must be governed by the Brussels Convention,

NOTING that the Lugano Convention is to enter into force after two States, of which one is a member of the European Communities and the other a member of the European Free Trade Association, have deposited their instruments of ratification, DECLARE THEMSELVES READY to take every appropriate measure with a view to ensuring that national procedures for the ratification of the Convention on the accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic to the Brussels Convention, signed today, are completed as soon as possible and, if possible, by 31 December 1992 at the latest.

In witness whereof the undersigned have signed this declaration.

REPORT ON THE PROTOCOLS

on the interpretation by the Court of Justice of the Convention of 29 February 1968 on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons and of the Convention of 27 September 1968 on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters

(Signed at Luxembourg, 3 June 1971)

By Mr P. JENARD

Directeur in the Belgian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and External Trade

I. General remarks

1. In Joint Declaration No 3, annexed to the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons, signed at Brussels on 29 February 1968, the Governments of the Member States of the European Communities expressed their willingness to study means of avoiding differences in the interpretation of the Convention. To this end, they agreed to examine the possibility of conferring jurisdiction in certain matters on the Court of Justice of the European Communities and, if necessary, to negotiate an agreement to that effect.

A similar Joint Declaration was annexed to the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, signed at Brussels on 27 September 1968. This Declaration envisages the possibility of assigning to the Court of Justice jurisdiction both to interpret the Convention and to settle any conflicting claims and disclaimers of jurisdiction which may arise in applying it.

2. In the course of negotiations to give effect to these Declarations, it was soon agreed to give the Court additional jurisdiction, and to use for the purpose a system based on Article 177 of the Treaty. The further question nevertheless arose as to whether it would be appropriate to draft a general convention applicable to all the conventions which had been or were to be concluded on the basis of Article 220, or whether it would not be preferable to seek solutions which took into account the individual characteristics of each of these conventions.

This question was approached in an entirely pragmatic manner. A detailed study was made of the two Conventions already signed, the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons, and the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters.

3. This study led to the conclusion that these two Conventions have distinct features which justify different arrangements for their interpretation by the Court of Justice. Although it had been suggested that a single convention might determine the jurisdiction of the Court to interpret all the conventions concluded on the basis of Article 220 of the Treaty, in the end it was thought preferable to conclude separate Protocols which would be better adapted to the requirements of each of the Conventions.

4. There was no need to apply the procedure of Article 236 of the Treaty for the purposes of concluding these Protocols since they deal with the interpretation of Conventions drawn up pursuant to Article 220 of the Treaty and in no way aim at revising the Treaty itself.

They merely confer on the Court of Justice further jurisdiction which is additional to, but does not affect, its existing jurisdiction [1].

II. Protocol on the interpretation of the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons

5. As regards the interpretation of the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons,

---

[1] On various occasions, jurisdiction has been conferred on the Court of Justice without reference to the revision procedure set out in Article 236 (internal agreements under Conventions of Association — see OJ No 93, 11. 6. 1964, p. 1490/64; provisions of Council Regulation No 17 on appeal to the Court — see OJ No 13, 21. 2. 1962, p. 204/62).

there was thought to be no reason for departing from the preliminary ruling system laid down in Article 177 of the Treaty; and this system was therefore adopted in the draft Protocol in question.

Article 1 of the Protocol confers on the Court jurisdiction to interpret the Convention of 29 February 1968, Joint Declaration No 1 contained in the Protocol annexed to that Convention, and the Protocol which is the subject of this report. Article 2 repeats, in identical terms, the second and third paragraphs of Article 177, defining the circumstances in which references may be made to the Court by courts which have to decide questions of interpretation.

6. Since the Convention sometimes refers back to national law, the problem arose as to whether it might be necessary expressly to exclude the jurisdiction of the Court to interpret such law. It was thought unnecessary expressly to exclude jurisdiction in this respect, for the cases decided by the Court of Justice have already firmly established that it has no jurisdiction to interpret national law.

7. Article 3 concerns the procedure to be followed before the Court of Justice when, in accordance with the Protocol, the Court is asked to give a ruling.

It was thought appropriate to provide that the Rules of Procedure of the Court should be supplemented to take account of the new jurisdiction. Article 3 (2) indicated that Article 188 of the Treaty is to be used for this purpose.

It was considered that, in order to ensure that the Convention would be applied as effectively and as uniformly as possible, an exchange of information should be organized on judgments of national courts against whose decision there is no remedy under national law.

A Joint Declaration to this effect is annexed to the Protocol.

III. Protocol on the interpretation of the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters

8. The study of the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters showed that it has features sufficiently distinctive to justify a separate system for its interpretation by the Court of Justice.

There was unanimous agreement on the need to ensure uniform interpretation of the Convention, and hence to confer new jurisdiction on the Court of Justice, using a system based on Article 177. But it was feared that, in view of the number and diversity of the disputes to which the Convention applies, an application for a preliminary ruling on the lines of Article 177 might be made by one of the parties either as a delaying tactic or as a means of putting pressure on an opponent of modest financial means. In short, the application might be made for improper purposes.

(1) This Convention will be applicable in a large number of cases. It governs not only recognition and enforcement of judgments, but also the international jurisdiction of the courts, and in particular all cases where a person is sued in the courts of a Contracting State in which he is not domiciled. Moreover, it is not confined to a limited field such as the recognition of companies, but extends to all civil and commercial matters relating to rights in property (litigation over all kinds of contract, non-contractual liability, maintenance, etc.).

(2) At the stage of recognition and enforcement, Article 34 of the Convention provides that the court to which application is made for the issue of an order for enforcement shall give its decision without delay, and without the party against whom enforcement is sought being entitled at that stage of the proceedings to make any submissions.

Plainly, an application to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling would, if made at this stage, undermine the object of the Convention which, by introducing a new, standardized, ex parte procedure for enforcement, aims at eliminating delaying tactics and preventing the respondent from withdrawing his assets from any measure of enforcement.

(3) Finally it must be stressed that decisions of the Court of Justice on the interpretation of the Convention differ from decisions on the interpretation of other conventions, as regards the consequences for the parties.

Thus, if the court were to interpret a provision of the Convention so as to rule that the courts seised of a matter had no jurisdiction, the proceedings might well have to be instituted again from the outset, either in a State other than that whose courts were originally seised or, perhaps, in other courts in the same State (see, for example, Article 5 of the Convention which lays down special rules of jurisdiction).

9. The Protocol therefore follows the system of Article 177, but subject to such adjustments as were thought necessary to deal with the matters set out above. The system may be summarized as follows:

(a) the courts which are allowed to refer questions to the court are expressly specified;

(b) the right to apply to the court for a preliminary ruling is not given to courts of first instance;

(c) the Protocol provides that the Courts of Cassation and other courts of last instance are required to refer a question of interpretation to the court if they consider that a decision of the Court on that question is necessary to enable them to give judgment;

(d) in addition to requests for a preliminary ruling, there is a novel provision for interpretation by the Court of Justice, similar to the 'pourvoi dans l'intérêt de la loi'.

10. Article 1, which is similar to Article 1 of the Protocol on the interpretation of the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons, confers on the Court jurisdiction to interpret the Convention of 27 September 1968 and its Protocol, as well as the Protocol which is the subject of this report.

11. Article 2 lists the national courts which may ask the Court to give a preliminary ruling.

(1) Courts of first instance are not included in this list. Their exclusion is designed mainly to prevent the interpretation of the Court being requested in too many cases, and particularly in trivial matters. Moreover, it was thought that where two courts of first instance, for example a 'justice de paix' and an Amtsgericht, gave judgments which became res judicata and showed differences of interpretation in the application of the Convention, this should not necessitate further action, any more than would similar differences of interpretation between two inferior courts of the same country. Similarly, it was argued that the Court of Justice should not be required to give rulings unless it was fully informed. In order to achieve this, questions of interpretation should, in the first place, be dealt with by the national courts, especially in view of the fact that in the interests of legal certainty the Court of Justice can only seldom depart from the principles established by its previous judgments.

(2) Article 2 (1) specifies by name the courts which are allowed to refer questions to the Court of Justice, including those which, pursuant to Article 3 (1), are required to do so. Such a list seemed to be essential, since the present wording of the third paragraph of Article 177 has given rise to conflicting interpretations as to which are the courts and tribunals against whose decisions there is no judicial remedy under national law (for example, the theoretical and pragmatic schools of thought in Germany).

It seemed all the more necessary to make this point clear because, under the Protocol, inferior courts have no jurisdiction to refer a question to the Court of Justice.

This list also takes into account the fact that the Convention of 27 September 1968 governs only civil and commercial matters concerning property rights; the list therefore includes only those Courts which have jurisdiction in such cases.

(3) Article 2 (2) states that the power to refer a question to the Court is also given to the courts of the Contracting States when they are sitting in an appellate capacity. The Courts in question thus include courts of appeal, save for the exceptional cases when they are sitting at first instance when sitting in an appellate capacity.

In the Federal Republic of Germany the expression 'appeal' includes 'Beschwerde'.

(4) Article 2 (3) lays down that in the cases provided for in Article 37 of the Convention of 27 September 1968, the courts referred to in that Article may also refer a question to the Court of Justice. It will be remembered that Article 37 governs appeals against judgments authorizing the enforcement of a foreign judgment.

12. Article 3 lays down that a court of last instance is bound to refer a question to the Court of Justice only 'if it considers that a decision on the question is necessary to enable it to enable it to give judgment'. In Article 177 of the Treaty of Rome this provision appears only in the second paragraph, governing cases in which other courts are entitled to refer a question to the Court of Justice.

The provision contained in Article 3 (1) of the Protocol accords with the interpretation now generally given to Article 177: it is generally agreed to be beyond dispute that a court of last instance has discretion to assess the relevance of questions put to it for interpretation.

Nevertheless, this provision seemed necessary to avoid conflicting interpretations; for it will be remembered that, as has already been pointed out in paragraph 8 (3) of this report, decisions of the Court of Justice on the interpretation of the Judgments Convention differ, in their consequences, from decisions of the interpretation of other conventions.

Thus if the jurisdiction of a court were challenged on appeal, and the Court of Justice ruled that the Convention had been misinterpreted by the first court, the proceedings might have to be instituted again from the very beginning, either in another State or, perhaps, in another court in the same State.

A party to an action might accordingly be greatly tempted to raise a question of interpretation of the Convention before an appellate court merely in order to gain time, and the temptation would be all the greater if that court were automatically required to refer the question to the Court of Justice.

A number of other solutions were considered, including giving the highest courts only a power, rather than a duty, to refer a question to the Court, or requiring them to refer a question only if they would otherwise give to a provision an interpretation different from the interpretation already given either by the Court of Justice or by other courts. Finally, however, a provision very close to Article 177 was adopted in order to achieve the greatest possible uniformity in Community law.

For the reasons set out above, it was thought necessary to confirm the discretion of courts of last instance by means of a clear and unambiguous text, and above all to make it proof against any possible subsequent tendency automatically to refer questions to the Court.

As regards its form, Article 3 differs from Article 177, in that it sets out first of all the rule for the courts of last instance, and thereafter for the other courts. The object of this modified form was to emphasize that the Protocol was designed solely to provide a specific solution to problems of interpretation of the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters.

13. Since the Convention also refers back to national law, reference should be made to what was said in this connection in the commentary on the protocol on the interpretation of the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies (see paragraph 6).

14. Article 4 lays down a new procedure based in part on the 'pourvoi dans l'intérêt de la loi' and in part on the procedure for giving advisory opinions. All the countries of the Community, with the exception of the Federal Republic of Germany, have a form of appeal for the clarification of a point of law which enables the competent judicial authority, in this instance the Procurators-General of the Courts of Cassation, to appeal against a final decision which misunderstands or misapplies either the letter or the spirit of the law. The purpose of this appeal is to avoid perpetuating an erroneous interpretation of the law where the parties have omitted to appeal against the decision which includes that interpretation (see Dalloz, Encyclopédie juridique under Cassation No 2509).

Article 4 is designed to make for a uniform interpretation of the Convention by introducing a procedure complementary to the request for a preliminary ruling provided for in Article 3. The purpose is to ensure a uniform interpretation for the future wherever existing judgments are in conflict.

In the last analysis, this procedure occupies an intermediate position between the 'pourvoi dans l'intérêt de la loi', from which it differs in that it does not entail the setting aside of a judgment which is ultimately shown to have misinterpreted the Convention, and that of an advisory appeal. The procedure is, however, limited to cases in which a court has already given judgment.

Paragraph 1 defines the cases in which the competent authority of a State may apply to the Court of Justice. It will be for that authority to decide whether it is advisable to refer a matter to the Court, and it will presumably not do so unless the national judgment includes reasons which might lead to an interpretation different from that previously given by the Court of Justice or by a foreign court. If there are no factors involved which make it likely that the principles established in the decided cases would be changed, the national authority could always seek to clarify the point of law by appealing in its own country in accordance with the procedure there in force.

Paragraph 2 lays down that rulings given by the Court shall not affect the decisions submitted to it, in the same way that the setting aside of a judgment following an appeal to clarify a point of law in no way influences the position of the parties.

It follows that the judgments of the Court cannot give rise to any fresh proceedings, even where otherwise an extraordinary avenue of appeal might be appropriate.

Paragraph 3 lays down that the Procurators-General of the Courts of Cassation (who, in the countries which know the 'pourvoi dans l'intérêt de la loi', are competent) or any other authority designated by a State, are entitled to request the Court of Justice for a ruling. The designation of the Procurators-General is further evidence that the appeal procedure laid down in Article 4 is intended solely to clarify points of law.

The wording of paragraph 3 takes account of the situation obtaining in Germany, where the 'pourvoi dans l'intérêt de la loi' is unknown. It furthermore empowers any of the Contracting States to designate any other authority or even to designate two authorities, as for example the Procurator-General for appeals against judgments of civil, commercial or criminal courts in civil matters, and the Minister of Justice for appeals against decisions of administrative tribunals.

Paragraph 4 amends Article 20 of the Statute of the Court of Justice to deal with the procedure provided for in Article 4. The amendment takes account of the fact that the parties to the original proceedings will have no interest in intervening at this stage.

It may be wondered what are the implications of a ruling on interpretation given on the basis of Article 4. The ruling certainly is not binding on the parties. It must be acknowledged that such a ruling has no force in law, and that accordingly nobody is bound by it. But clearly it will have the greatest persuasive authority and will for the future constitute the guideline for all Community courts. In this respect it may be compared with the decision on a 'pourvoi dans l'intérêt de la loi'. Such a decision is binding on nobody, but constitutes a decision of principle of the greatest importance for the future, and one which judges will generally follow.

15. Article 5 of the Protocol, like Article 3 of the Protocol on the interpretation of the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies, extends the provisions governing the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice to cover the exercise of the new jurisdiction conferred on it.

However, these provisions are extended only in so far as the Protocol does not otherwise provide; this reservation chiefly concerns Article 177 of the Treaty, whose provisions, even if they should be modified, are not applicable to the Protocol, which has its own separate provisions on this point.

16. Article 11 provides for any relevant amendment to the jurisdiction of the courts of the Contracting States.

17. The other Articles of the Protocol, which contain the final provisions, give rise to no particular comment. Again, an exchange of information is to be organized on the decisions of the courts referred to in Article 2 (1) in order to ensure that the Convention is applied as effectively and as uniformly as possible. A Joint Declaration to this effect is annexed to the Protocol.

18. The provisions of the Convention on lis pendens and related actions should go a long way, if not all the way, towards resolving any problems which may arise from conflicting claims and disclaimers of jurisdiction. Where, however, such problems arise from conflicting interpretations, they will be solved by applying the Protocol.

THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE MEMBER STATES OF THE EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY, MEETING WITHIN THE COUNCIL,

Desiring to ensure that in the spirit of the Convention of 17 September 1968 uniformity of jurisdiciton should also be achieved as widely as possible in maritime matters,

Considering that all of the Member States are not parties to the said Convention,

Express the wish that Member States which are coastal States and have not already become parties to the Convention of 10 May 1952 should do so as soon as possible.

JOINT DECLARATION of 26 May 1989

concerning the ratification of the Convention on the accession of the Kingdom of Spain and the Portuguese Republic to the 1968 Brussels Convention

THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE MEMBER STATES OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES, MEETING WITHIN THE COUNCIL,

DESIROUS that, in particular with a view to the completion of the internal market, application of the Brussels Convention and of the 1971 Protocol should be rapidly extended to the entire Community,

WELCOMING the conclusion on 16 September 1988 of the Lugano Convention which extends the principles of the Brussels Convention to those States becoming parties to the Lugano Convention, designed principally to govern relations between the Member States of the European Economic Community (EEC) and those of the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) with regard to the legal protection of persons established in any of those States and to the simplification of formalities for the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments,

CONSIDERING that the Brussels Convention has as its legal basis Article 220 of the Treaty of Rome and is interpreted by the Court of Justice of the European Communities,

MINDFUL that the Lugano Convention does not affect the application of the Brussels Convention as regards relations between Member States of the European Economic Community, since such relations must be governed by the Brussels Convention,

"Section 4

Jurisdiction over consumer contracts

Article 13

In proceedings concerning a contract concluded by a person for a purpose which can be regarded as being outside his trade or profession, hereinafter called "the consumer", jurisdiction shall be determined by this section, without prejudice to the provisions of Articles 4 and 5 (5), if it is: 1. a contract for the sale of goods on instalment credit terms, or

2. a contract for a loan repayable by instalments, or for any other form of credit, made to finance the sale of goods, or

3. any other contract for the supply of goods or a contract for the supply of services, and (a) in the State of the consumer's domicile the conclusion of the contract was preceded by a specific invitation adressed to him or by advertising, and

(b) the consumer took in that State the steps necessary for the conclusion of the contract.

Where a consumer enters into a contract with a party who is not domiciled in a Contracting State but has a branch, agency or other establishment in one of the Contracting States, that party shall, in disputes arising out of the operations of the branch, agency or establishment, be deemed to be domiciled in that State.

This section shall not apply to contracts of transport.

Article 14

A consumer may bring proceedings against the other party to a contract either in the courts of the Contracting State in which that party is domiciled or in the courts of the Contracting State in which he is himself domiciled.

Proceedings may be brought against a consumer by the other party to the contract only in the courts of the Contracting State in which the consumer is domiciled.

These provisions shall not affect the right to bring a counterclaim in the court in which, in accordance with this Section, the original claim is pending.

Article 15

The provisions of this Section may be departed from only by an agreement: 1. which is entered into after the dispute has arisen, or

2. which allows the consumer to bring proceedings in courts other than those indicated in this Section, or

3. which is entered into by the consumer and the other party to the contract, both of whom are at the time of conclusion of the contract domiciled or habitually resident in the same Contracting State, and which confers jurisdiction on the courts of that State, provided that such an agreement is not contrary to the law of that State."

Article 11

The following shall be substituted for Article 17 of the 1968 Convention.

"Article 17

If the parties, one or more of whom is domiciled in a Contracting State, have agreed that a court or the courts of a Contracting State are to have jurisdiction to settle any disputes which have arisen or which may arise in connection with a particular legal relationship, that court or those courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction. Such an agreement conferring jurisdiction shall be either in writing or evidenced in writing or, in international trade or commerce, in a form which accords with practices in that trade or commerce of which the parties are or ought to have been aware.

Where such an agreement is concluded by parties, none of whom is domiciled in a Contracting State, the courts of other Contracting States shall have no jurisdiction over their disputes unless the court or courts chosen have declined jurisdiction.

The court or courts of a Contracting State on which a trust instrument has conferred jurisdiction shall have exclusive jurisdiction in any proceedings brought against a settlor, trustee or beneficiary, if relations between these persons or their rights or obligations under the trust are involved.

Agreements or provisions of a trust instrument conferring jurisdiction shall have no legal force if they are contrary to the provisions of Article 12 or 15, or if the courts whose jurisdiction they purport to exclude have exclusive jurisdiction by virtue of Article 16.

If an agreement conferring jurisdiction was concluded for the benefit of only one of the parties, that party shall retain the right to bring proceedings in any other court which has jurisdiction by virtue of this Convention."

Article 12

The second paragraph of Article 20 of the 1968 Convention shall be replaced by the following:

2. With a view to its uniform interpretation, paragraph 1 of Article 57 shall be applied in the following manner: (a) the 1968 Convention as amended shall not prevent a court of a Contracting State which is a party to a convention on a particular matter from assuming jurisdiction in accordance with that Convention, even where the defendant is domiciled in another Contracting State which is not a party to that Convention. The court shall, in any event, apply Article 20 of the 1968 Convention as amended;

(b) a judgment given in a Contracting State in the exercise of jurisdiction provided for in a convention on a particular matter shall be recognized and enforced in the other Contracting States in accordance

In the absence of such declaration, proceedings taking place in the European territory of the Kingdom as a result of an appeal in cassation from the judgment of a court in the Netherlands Antilles shall be deemed to be proceedings taking place in the latter court.

Notwithstanding the first paragraph, this Convention shall not apply to: 1. the Faroe Islands, unless the Kingdom of Denmark makes a declaration to the contrary,

2. any European territory situated outside the United Kingdom for the international relations of which the United Kingdom is responsible, unless the United Kingdom makes a declaration to the contrary in respect of any such territory.

Such declarations may be made at any time by notifying the Secretary-General of the Council of the European Communities.

TITLE V TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

Article 34

1. The 1968 Convention and the 1971 Protocol, with the amendments made by this Convention, shall apply only to legal proceedings instituted and to authentic instruments formally drawn up or registered after the entry into force of this Convention in the State of origin and, where recognition or enforcement of a judgment or authentic instrument is sought, in the State addressed.

2. However, as between the six Contracting States to the 1968 Convention, judgments given after the date of entry into force of this Convention in proceedings instituted before that date shall be recognized and enforced in accordance with the provisions of Title III of the 1968 Convention as amended.

3. Moreover, as between the six Contracting States to the 1968 Convention and the three States mentioned in Article 1 of this Convention, and as between those three States, judgments given after the date of entry into force of this Convention between the State of origin and the State addressed in proceedings instituted before that date shall also be recognized and enforced in accordance with the provisions of Title III of the 1968 Convention as amended if jurisdiction was founded upon rules which accorded with the provisions of Title II, as amended, or with provisions of a convention concluded between the State of origin and the State addressed which was in force when the proceedings were instituted.

Article 35

If the parties to a dispute concerning a contract had agreed in writing before the entry into force of this Convention that the contract was to be governed by the law of Ireland or of a part of the United Kingdom, the courts of Ireland or of that part of the United Kingdom shall retain the right to exercise jurisdiction in the dispute.

Article 36

For a period of three years from the entry into force of the 1968 Convention for the Kingdom of Denmark and Ireland respectively, jurisdiction in maritime matters shall be determined in these States not only in accordance with the provisions of that Convention but also in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 1 to 6 following. However, upon the entry into force of the International Convention relating to the arrest of sea-going ships, signed at Brussels on 10 May 1952, for one of these States, these provisions shall cease to have effect for that State. 1. A person who is domiciled in a Contracting State may be sued in the courts of one of the States mentioned above in respect of a maritime claim if the ship to which the claim relates or any other ship owned by him has been arrested by judicial process within the territory of the latter State to secure the claim, or could have been so arrested there but bail or other security has been given, and either: (a) the claimant is domiciled in the latter State ; or

(b) the claim arose in the latter State ; or

(c) the claim concerns the voyage during which the arrest was made or could have been made;

or

(d) the claim arises out of a collision or out of damage caused by a ship to another ship or to goods or persons on board either ship, either by the execution or non-execution of a manoeuvre or by the non-observance of regulations ; or

(e) the claim is for salvage ; or

(f) the claim is in respect of a mortgage or hypothecation of the ship arrested.

2. A claimant may arrest either the particular ship to which the maritime claim relates, or any other ship which is owned by the person who was, at the time when the maritime claim arose, the owner of the particular ship. However, only the particular ship to which the maritime claim relates may be arrested in respect of the maritime claims set out in subparagraphs (o), (p) or (q) of paragraph 5 of this Article.

3. Ships shall be deemed to be in the same ownership when all the shares therein are owned by the same person or persons.

4. When in the case of a charter by demise of a ship the charterer alone is liable in respect of a maritime claim relating to that ship, the claimant may arrest that ship or any other ship owned by the charterer, but no other ship owned by the owner may be arrested in respect of such claim. The same shall apply to any case in which a person other than the owner of a ship is liable in respect of a maritime claim relating to that ship.

5. The expression "maritime claim" means a claim arising out of one or more of the following: (a) damage caused by any ship either in collision or otherwise;

(b) loss of life or personal injury caused by any ship or occurring in connection with the operation of any ship;

(c) salvage;

(d) agreement relating to the use or hire of any ship whether by charter-party or otherwise;

(m) wages of masters, officers or crew;

(n) master's disbursements, including disbursements made by shippers, charterers or agents on behalf of a ship or her owner;

(o) dispute as to the title to or ownership of any ship;

(p) disputes between co-owners of any ship as to the ownership, possession, employment or earnings of that ship;

(q) the mortgage or hypothecation of any ship.

6. In Denmark, the expression "arrest" shall be deemed as regards the maritime claims referred to in subparagraphs (o) and (p) of paragraph 5 of this Article, to include a "forbud", where that is the only procedure allowed in respect of such a claim under Articles 646 to 653 of the law on civil procedure (lov om rettens pleje).

REPORT ON THE CONVENTION on the Association of the Kingdom of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters and to the Protocol on its interpretation by the Court of Justice

(Signed at Luxembourg, 9 October 1978)

by Professor Dr Peter SCHLOSSER, of the Chair of German, international and foreign civil procedure, of the general theory of procedure and of civil law at the University of Munich

Pursuant to Article 3 (2) of the Act of Accession of 22 January 1972 a Council working party, convened as a result of a decision taken by the Committee of Permanent Representatives of the Member States, prepared a draft Convention on the accession of the Kingdom of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to the Convention of 27 September 1968 on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters and to the Protocol of 3 June 1971 on its interpretation by the Court of Justice. This working party was composed of government experts from the nine Member States and representatives from the Commission. The rapporteur, Mr P. Schlosser, Professor of Law at the University of Munich, drafted the explanatory report which was submitted to the governments at the same time as the draft prepared by the experts. The text of this report, which is a commentary on the Convention of Accession signed at Luxembourg on 9 October 1978, is now being published in this issue of the Official Journal.

INDEX

PRELIMINARY REMARKS

. Under Article 3 (2) of the Act of Accession, the new Member States undertook 'to accede to the Conventions provided for in Article 220 of the EEC Treaty, and to the Protocols on the interpretation of those Conventions by the Court of Justice, signed by the original Member States and to this end to enter into negotiations with the original Member States in order to make the necessary adjustments thereto'. As a first step the Commission of the European Communities made preparations for the impending discussions on the contemplated adjustments. On 29 November 1971, it submitted to the Council an interim report on the additions considered necessary to the two Conventions signed in 1968, namely the Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters (hereinafter referred to as 'the 1968 Convention') and the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons. Following consultations with the new Member States, the Commission on 15 September 1972 drew up a comprehensive report to the Council on the main problems arising from adjusting both Conventions to the legal institutions and systems of the new Member States. On the basis of this report, the Committee of Permanent Representatives decided on 11 October 1972 to set up a Working Party which was to be composed of delegates of the original and the new Member States of the Community and of a representative of the Commission. The Working Party held its inaugural meeting on 16 November 1972 under the chairmanship of the Netherlands delegate in accordance with the rota. On this occasion, it decided to focus its attention initially on negotiations concerning adjustments to the 1968 Convention which had already been ratified by the original Member States of the EEC and to the Protocol of 3 June 1971 on its interpretation ('the Interpretation Protocol of 1971'), and to postpone the work entrusted to it regarding the Convention on the mutual recognition of companies and legal persons. At its second meeting, the Working Party elected the author of this report as its rapporteur. On the basis of a request made by the Working Party at its third meeting in June 1973, the Committee of Permanent Representatives appointed Mr Jenard, the 'Directeur d'administration auprès du ministère belge des Affaires Étrangères', as its permanent chairman.

2. The Working Party initially considered proposing the legal form of a Protocol for the accession of the new Member States to the 1968 Convention, and that the adjustments contemplated should be annexed thereto. However, this method would have introduced some confusion into the subject. A distinction would then have had to be made between three different Protocols, i.e. the Protocol referred to in Article 65 of the 1968 Convention, the Interpretation Protocol of 1971 and the new Protocol on accession. Furthermore, there were no grounds for dividing the new provisions required in consequence of the accession of the new Member States to the 1968 Convention by putting some into a protocol and others into an act of accession annexed to it. The Working Party therefore presented the outcome of its discussions in the form of a draft Convention between the original Member States and the new Member States of the EEC. This draft Convention makes provision for accession both to the 1968 Convention and to the Interpretation Protocol of 1971 (Title I) as well as for the necessary changes to them (Titles II and IV). The accession of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom to the 1968 Convention extends also to the Protocol referred to in Article 65 which is an integral part of the 1968 Convention. The Working Party also proposed adjustments to this Protocol (Title III).

The decision of the Working Party to adopt the legal form of a Convention incorporating adjustments instead of replacing the 1968 Convention by a new Convention has the advantage that the unchanged provisions of the 1968 Convention do not require renewed ratification.

Accordingly three different 'Conventions' will in future have to be distinguished:

The Convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters in its original form will be referred to as 'the 1968 Convention' (1).

The expression 'Accession Convention' refers to the draft Convention proposed by the Working Party.

After ratification of the Accession Convention certain provisions of the 1968 Convention will exist in an amended form. References in this report to the amended form will be indicated by the addition of that word, e.g. 'Article 5 (2) as amended'.

3. The structure of this report does not closely follow the structure of the proposed new Accession Convention. In many places, this report can only be understood, or at any rate is easier to understand, if it is read in conjunction with the corresponding parts of the reports on the 1968 Convention and on the Interpretation Protocol of 1971 which were drawn up by the present permanent chairman and erstwhile rapporteur of the Working Party (hereinafter referred to as 'the Jenard report'). The structure of this report is based on that of these earlier reports.

CHAPTER 2

REASONS FOR THE CONVENTION

4. The second chapter of the Jenard report sets out the reasons for concluding a Convention. They apply with at least as much force to the new Member States as they did to the relationships between the original Member States of the EEC, but they do not call for further close examination here. The obligation on the new Member States to accede to the 1968 Convention is laid down in Article 3 (2) of the Act of Accession to the EEC Treaty. However, in order to give a clear view of the legal position, it may be helpful to supplement the references in the Jenard report to the laws in force in the original Member States of the EEC and to the existing Conventions between these States with details concerning the new Member States.

A.

THE LAW IN FORCE IN THE NEW MEMBER STATES

1. UNITED KINGDOM

5. The legal position in the United Kingdom is characterized by six significant features.

6. (a) In the first place, there is a distinction between recognition and enforcement at common law on the one hand and under the Foreign judgments (reciprocal enforcement) Act 1933 on the other.

At common law, a judgment given in a foreign State may serve as a basis for proceedings before courts in the United Kingdom, if the adjudicating court was competent to assume jurisdiction. This legal consequence follows irrespective of whether or not there is reciprocity. In this connection, recognition and enforceability are not limited to the use of the foreign judgment as evidence. The United Kingdom court dealing with the case may not in general review the substance of the foreign judgment. There are, of course, a limited number of grounds for refusing recognition.

For recognition and enforcement under the Foreign judgments (reciprocal enforcement) Act 1933 on the other hand the successful party does not have to institute fresh proceedings before courts in the United Kingdom on the basis of the foreign judgment. The successful party merely has to have the judgment registered with the appropriate court. However, this simplified recognition and enforcement procedure is available only where the judgment to be recognized was given by a Superior Court, and, more important, where a convention on the reciprocal recognition and enforcement of judgments is in force between the State of origin and the United Kingdom. Once the foreign judgment is registered, it has the same legal force and effect as a judgment given by the court of registration.

7. (b) Both these methods are available in the United Kingdom only for the enforcement of judgments which order payment of a specific sum of money. Consequently maintenance orders made by foreign courts which stipulate periodic payments are not generally enforceable in the United Kingdom. However, the Maintenance orders (reciprocal enforcement) Act which came into force in 1972 makes it possible for international treaty obligations to be concluded in this field.

8. (c) Both at common law and under the 1933 Act, it is a requirement for recognition and enforcement that the judgment should be 'final and conclusive between the parties'. This requirement is clearly satisfied where the adjudicating court can no longer alter its judgment or can only do so in very exceptional circumstances. Similarly, neither the fact that the period during which an appeal may be made is still running nor even a pending appeal prevent this requirement from being satisfied. However, maintenance orders which stipulate periodic payments are excluded from recognition since they may be varied to take account of changed circumstances unless they are covered by the abovementioned Maintenance orders (reciprocal enforcement) Act 1972.

9. (d) It is possible to institute proceedings on the basis of a foreign judgment or to make an application for its registration under the 1933 Act during a period of six years from the date on which the judgment was given.

10. (e) United Kingdom law distinguishes between the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in the same way as the other States of the Community. If a foreign judgment fulfils the common law requirements for its recognition or if it is registered with a United Kingdom court, it becomes effective also in fields other than enforcement. A clear distinction is made between recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments in, for example, the bilateral Conventions with France and Germany.

The requirements mentioned in paragraphs 7 and 9 are not set out in those Conventions as requirements for recognition.

11. (f) Finally, it should be noted that the United Kingdom although not a federal State, is not a single legal and judicial area. It consists of three areas with different legal systems: England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. Whilst the common law rules described in paragraph 6 apply uniformly to the whole of the United Kingdom, the different judicial systems in each of the three legal areas of this State have to be taken into consideration when the 1933 Act is applied. Applications for registration have to be made in England and Wales to the High Court of Justice, in Scotland to the Court of Session, and in Northern Ireland to the High Court of Justice of Northern Ireland. If registration is granted, the judgment can be enforced only in the area in which the relevant courts have jurisdiction, which extends to the whole of England and Wales, of Scotland or of Northern Ireland respectively (see paragraph 209; for maintenance orders, see paragraphs 210 and 218). Recognition of a judgment is, nevertheless, independent of its registration.

2. IRELAND

12. The common law provisions of Irish law are similar to those which apply in the United Kingdom. The only statutory provisions of Irish law on the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments are contained in the Maintenance orders (reciprocal enforcement) Act 1974. This Act gives effect to an international agreement between Ireland and the United Kingdom for the reciprocal recognition of maintenance orders made by courts in those States. The agreement is expressed to terminate on the coming into force of the 1968 Convention for both States.

3. DENMARK

13. Under paragraph 223a of the Law of 11 April 1916, foreign judgments can be recognized only if a treaty providing reciprocity has been concluded with the State of origin, or if binding effect has been given to judgments of a foreign State by Royal Decree. Denmark has concluded no bilateral conventions on recognition and enforcement. There is only one Royal Decree of the type referred to and it concerns judgments given by German courts (2).

B.

EXISTING CONVENTIONS

14. Apart from Conventions relating to particular matters (see paragraph 238 et seq.), the United Kingdom is the only new Member State to be bound to other Member States of the EEC by bilateral Conventions on the recognition and enforcement of judgments. These are the Conventions with France, Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy and the Netherlands listed in the new version of Article 55 (see paragraph 237). These bilateral Conventions serve to implement the Foreign judgments (reciprocal enforcement) Act for the United Kingdom (see paragraph 6) and therefore contain provisions which more or less follow the same pattern. The requirements for recognition and enforcement correspond to the criteria mentioned in paragraphs 6 to 11 above. Rules providing for 'direct' jurisdiction [3] are not included.

C.

GENERAL ARRANGEMENT OF THE PROPOSED ADJUSTMENTS

15. Neither Article 3 (2) of the Act of Accession nor the terms of reference given to the Working Party provide any clear guide of what is meant by 'necessary adjustments'.

The term could be given a very narrow interpretation. The emphasis would then have to be laid above all on the requirement of necessity, in the sense of indispensability. At the beginning of the Working Party's discussions it became clear, however, that such a narrow view of the contemplated adjustments was bound to make it more difficult for the 1968 Convention to take root in the legal systems of the new Member States. There are a variety of reasons for this.

1. SPECIAL STRUCTURAL FEATURES OF THE LEGAL SYSTEMS OF THE NEW MEMBER STATES

16. The 1968 Convention implicitly proceeded from a legal background common to the original Member States of the EEC. By contrast the legal systems of the new Member States unmistakably contain certain special structural features. It would hardly have been reasonable to expect these States to adjust their national law to the legal position on which the 1968 Convention is based.

On the contrary, adjustment of the Convention seemed the more obvious course on occasion. This applies, for example, to the distinction made in Articles 30 and 38 between ordinary and extraordinary appeals (see paragraph 195 et seq.), which does not exist in United Kingdom and Irish law, to the system of registering judgments in the United Kingdom instead of the system of granting enforcement orders (see paragraph 208) and to the concept of the trust which is a characteristic feature of the common law [4] (see paragraph 109 et seq.). The same also applies to the inter-relation existing in Denmark between judicial and administrative competence in maintenance cases (see paragraph 66 et seq.).

2. AMBIGUITIES IN THE EXISTING TEXT

17. In certain cases, enquiries about the precise meaning of some provisions of the 1968 Convention by the States obliged to accede to it clearly showed that their interpretation was often uncertain and controversial. The Working Party decided therefore to propose that certain provisions of the 1968 Convention should be given a more precise wording or an authoritative interpretation. This applies, for example, to the provisions about granting legal aid in enforcement proceedings (see paragraph 223). The Working Party also dealt in this way with the provisions of Article 57 on the relation between the 1968 Convention and other Conventions, (see paragraph 238 et seq.). In most cases, however, the information requested could be given in a sufficiently clear and uniform way, so that this report need do no more than refer to it.

3. FURTHER DEVELOPMENTS IN THE LAW OF THE ORIGINAL MEMBER STATES OF THE EEC

18. In yet other cases, enquiries by the new Member States about the content of some provisions of the 1968 Convention revealed that in the original Member States of the EEC too the law had in the meantime evolved in such a way that general adjustments ratner than adjustments restricted to relations with the new Member States seemed advisable. This applies particularly to proceedings in matters of family law in which ancillary relief, and especially maintenance claims, are now often combined with the main proceedings concerning status. In family and matrimonial matters, such combined proceedings have replaced the traditional system of separating status proceedings from subsequent proceedings in many countries during the years following the signing of the 1968 Convention. This is the reason for the revised Article 5 (2) proposed by the Working Party (see paragraphs 32 and 90). The development of consumer protection law in the Member States led to a completely new version of Section 4 of Title II, and in one case the 1968 Convention was amended as a result of judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Communities (see paragraph 179).

4. SPECIFIC ECONOMIC EFFECTS

19. Finally, it became apparent that certain provisions of the 1968 Convention in their application to the new Member States would have economic repercussions unequalled in the original Member States. Thus, the worldwide significance of the British insurance market prompted the Working Party to recommend amendments concerning jurisdiction in insurance matters (see paragraph 136). The new paragraph (7) of Article 5 (see paragraph 122) is justified by the special position occupied by British maritime jurisdiction.

CHAPTER 3

SCOPE OF THE CONVENTION

20. As already discussed in the Jenard report, the provisions governing the scope of the 1968 Convention contain four significant elements. These required some further explanation in the context of the relationship of the original Member States to each other. They are:

1. Limitation to proceedings and judgments on matters involving international legal relationships (I).

2. Duty of the national courts to observe the provisions governing the scope of the 1968 Convention of their own motion (II).

3. Limitation of the Convention to civil and commercial matters (III).

4. A list (Article 1, second paragraph) of matters excluded from the scope of the Convention (IV).

In the relationship of the original Member States to each other there was no problem about a fifth criterion which is much more clearly brought out in the title of the 1968 Convention than in Article 1 which defines its scope. The 1968 Convention only applies where court proceedings and court decisions are involved. Proceedings and decisions of administrative authorities do not come within the scope of the 1968 Convention. This gave rise to a particular problem of adjustment in relation to Denmark (V).

I. MATTERS INVOLVING INTERNATIONAL LEGAL RELATIONSHIPS

21. The accession of the new Member States to the 1968 Convention in no way affects the application of the principle that only proceedings and judgments about matters involving international legal relationships are affected, so that reference need only be made to Section I of Chapter III of the Jenard report.

II. BINDING NATURE OF THE CONVENTION

22. Under Articles 19 and 20 of the 1968 Convention the provisions concerning 'direct jurisdiction' are to be observed by the court of its own motion: in some cases, i.e. where exclusive jurisdiction exists, irrespective of whether the defendant takes any steps; in other cases only where the defendant challenges the jurisdiction. Similarly, a court must also of its own motion consider whether there exists an agreement on jurisdiction which excludes the court's jurisdiction and which is valid in accordance with Article 17.

An obligation to observe the rules of jurisdiction of its own motion is by no means an unusual duty for a court in the original Member States. However, the United Kingdom delegation pointed out that such a provision would mean a fundamental change for its courts. Hitherto United Kingdom courts had been able to reach a decision only on the basis of submissions of fact or law made by the parties. Without infringing this principle, no possibility existed of examining their jurisdiction of their own motion.

However, Article 3 (2) of the Act of Accession cannot be interpreted as requiring the amendment of any provisions of the Conventions referred to on the ground that introduction of those provisions into the legal system of a new Member State would necessitate certain changes in its long-established legal practices and procedures.

It does not necessarily follow from Articles 19 and 20 of the 1968 Convention that the courts must, of their own motion, investigate the facts relevant to deciding the question of jurisdiction, that they must for example inquire where the defendant is domiciled. The only essential factor is that uncontested assertions by the parties should not bind the court. For this reason the following rule is reconcilable with the 1968 Convention: a court may assume jurisdiction only if it is completely satisfied of all the facts on which such jurisdiction is based; if it is not so satisfied it can and must request the parties to provide the necessary evidence, in default of which the action will be dismissed as inadmissible. In such circumstances the lack of jurisdiction would be declared by the court of its own motion, and not as a result of a challenge by one of the parties. Whether a court is itself obliged to investigate the facts relevant to jurisdiction, or whether it can, or must, place the burden of proof in this respect on the party interested in the jurisdiction of the court concerned, is determined solely by national law. Indeed some of the legal systems of the original Member States, for example Germany, do not require the court itself to undertake factual investigations in a case of exclusive jurisdiction, even though lack of such jurisdiction has to be considered by the court of its own motion.

III. CIVIL AND COMMERCIAL MATTERS

23. The scope of the 1968 Convention is limited to legal proceedings and judgments which relate to civil and commercial matters. All such proceedings not expressly excluded fall within its scope.

In particular, it is irrelevant whether an action is brought 'against' a named defendant (see paragraphs 124 et seq.). It is true that in such a case Article 2 et seq. cannot operate; but otherwise the 1968 Convention remains applicable.

The distinction between civil and commercial matters on the one hand and matters of public law on the other is well recognized in the legal systems of the original Member States and is, in spite of some important differences, on the whole arrived at on the basis of similar criteria. Thus the term 'civil law' also includes certain important special subjects which are not public law, especially, for example, parts of labour law.

For this reason the draftsmen of the original text of the 1968 Convention, and the Jenard report, did not include a definition of civil and commercial matters and merely stated that the 1968 Convention also applies to decisions of criminal and administrative courts, provided they are given in a civil or commercial matter, which occasionally happens. In this last respect, the accession of the three new Member States presents no additional problems. But as regards the main distinction referred to earlier considerable difficulties arise.

In the United Kingdom and Ireland the distinction commonly made in the original EEC States between private law and public law is hardly known. This meant that the problems of adjustment could not be solved simply by a reference to these classifications. In view of the Judgment of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 14 October 1976 ([5]), which was delivered during the final stages of the discussions and which decided in favour of an interpretation which made no reference to the 'applicable' national law, the Working Party restricted itself to declaring, in Article 1, paragraph 1, that revenue, customs or administrative matters are not civil or commercial matters within the meaning of the Convention. Moreover, the legal practice in the Member States of the Community, including the new Member States, must take account of the above judgment which states that, in interpreting the concept of civil and commercial matters, reference must be made 'first, to the objectives and scheme of the Convention and, secondly, to the general principles which stem from the corpus of the national legal systems'.

As a result of this all that this report can do is to throw light on the Court's instructions by setting out some details of comparative law.

A.

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN IRELAND AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

24. In the United Kingdom and in Ireland the expression 'civil law' is not a technical term and has more than one meaning. It is used mainly as the opposite of criminal law. Except in this limited sense, no distinction is made between 'private' and 'public' law which is in any way comparable to that made in the legal systems of the original Member States, where it is of fundamental importance. Constitutional law, administrative law and tax law are all included in 'civil law'. Admittedly the United Kingdom is already a party to several Conventions which expressly apply only to 'civil and commercial matters'. These include all the bilateral Conventions on the enforcement of foreign judgments concluded by the United Kingdom. None of these, however, contains any rules which decide the circumstances under which an original court before which an issue is brought may assume jurisdiction. They govern only the recognition and enforcement of judgments and deal with questions of jurisdiction only indirectly as a condition of recognition. Moreover, these Conventions generally only apply to judgments ordering the payment of a specific sum of money (see paragraph 7). In drafting them, a pragmatic approach dispensing with a definition of 'civil and commercial matters' proved, therefore, quite adequate.

B.

ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE CONTINENTAL MEMBER STATES

25. In the legal systems of the original Member States, the State itself and corporations exercising public functions such as local authorities may become involved in legal transactions in two ways. Having regard to their special functions and the fact that they are formally part of public law they may act outside private law in a 'sovereign' capacity. If they do this, their administrative ac ('Verwaltungsakt', 'décision exécutoire') is of a special nature. The State and some other public corporations may, however, also engage in legal transactions in the same way as private individuals. They can conclude contracts subject to private law, for example with transport undertakings for the carriage of goods or persons in accordance with tariffs generally in force or with a property owner for the lease of premises. The State and public corporations can also incur tortious liability in the same way as private individuals, for example as a result of a traffic accident in which an official car is involved. The real difficulty arises from distinguishing between instances in which the State and its independent organs act in a private law capacity and those in which they act in a public law capacity. A few guidelines on how this difficulty may be overcome are set out below.

The difficulties of finding a dividing line are of three kinds. The field of activities governed by public law differs in the various continental Member States (1). Public authorities frequently have a choice of the form in which they wish to act (2). The position is relatively clear only regarding the legal relations between the State and its independent organs (3).

1. THE VARYING EXTENT OF PUBLIC LAW

26. The most important difference between national administrative laws on the continent consists in the legal rules governing the duties of public authorities to provide supplies for themselves and for public tasks. For this purpose the French legal system has established the separate concept of administrative contracts which are governed independently of the 'Code civil' by a special law, the 'Code des marchés publics'. The administrative contract is used both when public authorities wish to cover their own requirements and when public works, such as surface or underground construction, land development, etc., have to be undertaken. In such situations the French State and public corporations do not act in the capacity of private persons. The characteristic result of this is that, if the other parties to the contract do not perform their obligations, the State and public corporations do not have to bring an action before the courts, but may impose unilaterally enforceable sanctions by an administrative act ('décision exécutoire'). The legal situation in Germany is quite different. There the administrative contract plays a completely subordinate role. Supplies to the administrative agencies, and in particular the placing of contracts for public works, are carried out solely on the basis of private law. Even where the State undertakes large projects like the construction of a dam or the channelling of a river, it concludes its contracts with the firms concerned like a private individual.

2. CHOICE OF TYPE OF LAW

27. However, the borderline between the public law and the private law activities of public agencies is not rigidly prescribed in some of the legal systems. Public authorities have, within certain limits, a right to choose whether in carrying out their functions they wish to use the method of a 'sovereign act', i.e. an administrative contract, or merely to conclude a private transaction.

In respect of those areas where public authorities may act either under private or public law, it is not always easy to decide whether or not they have acted as private individuals. In practice a clear indication is often lacking.

3. RELATIONSHIP OF PUBLIC AUTHORITIES TO ONE ANOTHER

28. Relations between public authorities may also be governed either by private or by public law. If governed by public law, such relations are not subject to the 1968 Convention, even if, as in Italy, they are not considered part of administrative law. However, relations of States and public corporations with each other would fall almost without exception within the sphere of private law, if they contain international aspects (and are not subject to public international law). It is hard to imagine how, for example, it would be possible for relations under public law to exist between two local authorities in different States. However, such relations could, of course, be established in future by treaties.

C.

CIVIL AND CRIMINAL LAW

29. The Working Party considered it obvious that criminal proceedings and criminal judgments of all kinds are excluded from the scope of the 1968 Convention, and that this matter needed, therefore, no clarification in the revised text (see paragraph 17). This applies not only to criminal proceedings stricto sensu. Other proceedings imposing sanctions for breaches of orders or prohibitions intended to safeguard the public interest also fall outside the scope of civil law. Certain difficulties may arise in some cases in classifying private penalties known to some legal systems like contractual penalty clauses, penalties imposed by associations, etc. Since in many legal systems criminal proceedings may be brought by a private plaintiff, a distinction cannot be made by reference to the party which instituted the proceedings. The decisive factor is whether the penalty is for the benefit of the private plaintiff or some other private individual. Thus the decisions of the Danish industrial courts imposing fines, which are for the benefit of the plaintiff or some other aggrieved party, certainly fall within the scope of the 1968 Convention.

IV. MATTERS EXPRESSLY EXCLUDED

30. The second paragraph of Article 1 sets out under four points the civil matters excluded from the scope of the 1968 Convention. The accession of the new Member States raises problems in respect of all four points.

A.

STATUS OR LEGAL CAPACITY OF NATURAL PERSONS, RIGHTS IN PROPERTY ARISING OUT OF A MATRIMONIAL RELATIONSHIP, WILLS AND SUCCESSION

31. The Working Party encountered considerable difficulties when dealing with two problems relating to point (1) of the second paragraph of Article 1. The first problem was that of maintenance proceedings ancillary to status proceedings (1) and the second problem was the meaning of the term 'régimes matrimoniaux' (rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship) (2). Apart from these two problems, the enquiries directed to the Working Party by the new Member States in respect of point (1) of the second paragraph of Article 1 were relatively easy to answer (3).

1. MAINTENANCE JUDGMENTS ANCILLARY TO STATUS PROCEEDINGS (ANCILLARY MAINTENANCE JUDGMENTS)

32. When the 1968 Convention was drawn up, the principle still applied in the original Member States that disputes relating to property could not be combined with status proceedings, nor could maintenance proceedings be combined with proceedings for the dissolution of a marriage or paternity proceedings. It was therefore possible, without running the risk of creating disadvantages caused by artificially separating proceedings which in reality belonged together, to exclude status matters, but not maintenance proceedings, from the scope of the 1968 Convention. Once this rule comes up against national legislation which allows combined proceedings comprising maintenance claims and status matters, it will perforce give rise to great difficulties. These difficulties had already become serious in the original Member States, as soon as the widespread reform of family law had led to an increasing number of combined proceedings in those countries. Accordingly a mere adjustment of the 1968 Convention as between the original and new Member States would have provided only a piecemeal solution. Time and opportunity were ripe for an adjustment of the 1968 Convention, even as regards the relationships between the original Member States, to take account of the developments in the law which had taken place (see paragraph 18).

33. (a) The solution proposed by the Working Party is the outcome of a lengthy and intensive study of the possible alternatives. A distinctive feature of the 1968 Convention is the inter-relation of the application of its rules of jurisdiction at the adjudicating stage and the prohibition against reopening the question of jurisdiction at the recognition stage. Consequently, on the basis of the original text of the Convention only two completely clear-cut solutions present themselves as regards the treatment of ancillary maintenance judgments. The first is that the adjudicating court dealing with a status matter may give an ancillary maintenance judgment only when it has jurisdiction under the 1968 Convention; the maintenance judgment must then be recognized by the foreign court which may not re-examine whether the original adjudicating court had jurisdiction. The second possible solution is that ancillary maintenance judgments should also be excluded from the scope of the 1968 Convention under point (1) of the second paragraph of Article 1 as being ancillary to status judgments. However, both solutions have practical drawbacks. The second would result in ancillary maintenance judgments being generally excluded from recognition and enforcement under the 1968 Convention, even though the great majority of cases are decided by courts which would have had jurisdiction under its provisions. In an unacceptably high number of cases established maintenance claims would then no longer be able to move freely. The first solution would constitute a retrograde step from the progressive and widely acclaimed achievement of combined proceedings and judgments in status and maintenance matters.

34. In view of the above, the simplest solution would have been to include rules of jurisdiction covering status proceedings in the 1968 Convention. However, the reasons given earlier against taking that course are still valid. Therefore, the only way out is to opt for one of the two alternatives outlined above, whilst mitigating its drawbacks as far as possible. In the view of the Working Party, to deprive maintenance judgments ancillary to status proceedings of the guarantee of their enforceability abroad, or to recognize them only to a severely limited extent, would be the greater evil.

35. The Working Party therefore tried first of all to find a solution along the following lines. National courts dealing with status matters should have unrestricted power to decide also on maintenance claims, even when they cannot use their jurisdiction in respect of the maintenance claim on any provision of the 1968 Convention; ancillary maintenance judgments should in principle be recognized and enforced, but the court addressed may, contrary to the principles of the 1968 Convention which would otherwise apply, re-examine whether the court which gave judgment on the maintenance claims had jurisdiction under the provisions of Title II. However, the principle that the jurisdiction of the court of origin should not be re-examined during the recognition and enforcement stages was one of the really decisive achievements of the 1968 Convention. Any further restriction of this principle, even if limited to one area, would be justifiable only if all other conceivable alternatives were even more unacceptable.

36. The proposed addition to Article 5 would on the whole have most advantages. It prevents maintenance judgments which are ancillary to status judgments being given on the basis of the rule of exorbitant jurisdiction which generally applies in family law matters, namely the rule which declares the nationality of only one of the two parties as sufficient. One can accept that maintenance proceedings may not be combined with status proceedings where the competence of the court concerned is based solely on such exorbitant jurisdiction. For status proceedings, jurisdiction will continue to depend on the nationality of one of the two parties. The maintenance proceedings will have to be brought before another court with jurisdiction under the 1968 Convention.

(b) The significance of the new approach is as follows:

37. It applies uniformly to the original and to the new Member States alike.

38. The jurisdiction of the court of origin may not be re-examined during the recognition and enforcement stages. This still follows from the third paragraph of Article 28 even after the addition made to Article 5. The court of origin has a duty to examine very carefully whether it has jurisdiction under the 1968 Convention, because a wrong decision on the question of jurisdiction cannot be corrected later on.

39. Similar rules apply in respect of lis pendens. It was not necessary to amend Articles 21 and 23. As long as the maintenance claim is pending before the court seised of the status proceedings it may not validly be brought before the courts of another State.

40. The question whether the court seised of the status proceedings has indeed jurisdiction also in respect of the maintenance proceedings, without having to rely solely on the nationality of one of the parties to the proceedings, is to be determined solely by the lex fori, including of course its private international law and procedural law. Even where the courts of a State may not as a rule combine a status matter with a maintenance claim, but can do so if a foreign legal system applicable under the provisions of their private international law so provides, they have jurisdiction in respect of the maintenance claim under the provisions of Article 5 (2) of the 1968 Convention as amended. This is subject to the proviso that the court concerned in fact had jurisdiction in respect of both the status proceedings and the maintenance claim under the current provisions of its own national law.

41. The 1968 Convention prohibits the assumption of a combined jurisdiction which may be provided for under the national law to cover both status and maintenance proceedings only where the court's jurisdiction would be based solely on the nationality of one of the two parties. This concerns principally the exorbitant jurisdictions which are referred to in the second paragraph of Article 3, and provided for in Article 15 of the Belgian Civil Code (Code civil), and Articles 14 and 15 of the French and Luxembourg Civil Code (Code civil), governing proceedings which do not relate only to status and are therefore not excluded pursuant to point (1) of the second paragraph of Article 1. Maintenance actions combined with status proceedings continue to be permitted, even if the jurisdiction of the court is based on grounds other than those which are normally excluded by the 1968 Convention as being exorbitant. Jurisdiction on the basis of both parties having the same nationality is excluded by the 1968 Convention in respect of ordinary civil and commercial matters, (Article 3, second paragraph), but in respect of combined status and maintenance proceedings, it cannot be considered as exorbitant, and consequently should not be inadmissible. The plaintiff's domicile is recognized in any case as a basis for jurisdiction in maintenance actions.

Finally, the proposed addition to Article 5 (2) deprives courts of jurisdiction to entertain maintenance claims in combined family law proceedings only where their jurisdiction in respect of the status proceedings is based solely on the nationality of one of the two parties. Where the jurisdiction of a court depends on the fulfilment of several conditions, only one of which is that one of the parties should possess the nationality of the country concerned, jurisdiction does not depend solely on the nationality of the two parties.

Article 606 (3) of the German Code of Civil Procedure is intended to ensure, in conjunction with Article 606a, that in matrimonial matters a German court always has jurisdiction, even when only one of the spouses is German. The fact that this provision is only supplementary to other provisions governing jurisdiction does not change the fact that jurisdiction may be based solely on the nationality of one of the parties. Once Article 5 (2) of the 1968 Convention comes into force in its amended form maintenance claims can no longer be brought and decided under that particular jurisdiction.

42. Article 5 (2) does not apply where the defendant is not domiciled in a Contracting State, or where maintenance questions can be decided without the procedural requirement of a claim or petition by one spouse against the other (see paragraph 66).

2. RIGHTS IN PROPERTY ARISING OUT OF A MATRIMONIAL RELATIONSHIP

43. The exclusion of 'rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship' from the scope of the Convention (Article 1 second paragraph, point (1)) raises a problem for the United Kingdom and Ireland.

Neither of these countries has an equivalent legal concept, although the expression 'matrimonial property' is used in legal literature. In principle, property rights as between spouses are governed by general law. Agreements between spouses regulating their property rights are no different in law from agreements with third parties. Occasionally, however, there are special statutory provisions affecting the rights of spouses. Under English law (Matrimonial homes Act 1967) and Irish law (Family home protection Act 1976), a spouse is entitled to certain rights of occupation of the matrimonial home. Moreover, divorce courts in the United Kingdom have, under the Matrimonial causes Act 1973, considerable powers, though varying in extent in the different parts of the country, to order the payment of capital sums by one former spouse to the other. In England even a general redistribution of property as between former spouses and their children is possible.

The concept of 'rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship' can also give rise to problems in the legal systems of the original Member States. It does not cover the same legal relations in all the systems concerned.

For a better understanding of the problems involved, they are set out more fully below (a), before the solution proposed by the Working Party is discussed (b).

44. (a) Three observations may give an indication of what is meant by 'matrimonial regimes' (rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship) in the legal systems of the seven continental Member States. They will deal with the character of the concept which is confined exclusively to relationships between spouses (paragraph 45), with the relationship with the provisions which apply to all marriages irrespective of the particular 'matrimonial regime' between the spouses (paragraph 46), and finally with the possibility of third parties becoming involved (paragraph 47).

45. For the purpose of governing the relations between spouses in respect of property, these legal systems do not, or at least not predominantly, employ the legal concepts and institutions otherwise used in their civil law. Instead, they have developed exclusive legal institutions the application of which is limited to relations between spouses, and whose most important feature is a comprehensive set of rules governing property. However, there is not merely one such set of rules in each legal system. Instead, spouses have a choice between several, ranging from general 'community of property' to strict 'separation of property'. Even the latter, when chosen by the spouses, is a special form of 'property regime', although special features arising from marriage can then hardly be said to exist any longer. The choice of a 'property regime' must take the form of a 'marriage contract' which is a special legal concept and should not be confused with the conclusion of the marriage itself. If the spouses do not make a choice, one of the sets of rules governing property rights applies to them by law (known as the 'statutory matrimonial regime').

In some legal systems (France and Belgium) the 'matrimonial regime' existing at the beginning of a marriage can subsequently be changed only in exceptional circumstances. In others (Germany) the spouses are free to alter their 'matrimonial regime' at any time.

Disputes concerning 'matrimonial regimes' can arise in various forms. There may be a dispute about the existence and interpretation of a marriage contract. In certain circumstances, a spouse may apply to the court for conversion of one 'matrimonial regime' into a different one. Some 'matrimonial regimes' provide for different rules in respect of different types of property. A dispute may then arise as to the type of property to which a particular object belongs. Where the 'matrimonial regime' in question differentiates between the management of different types of property, there may be disagreement as to which spouse may manage which items of property. The most frequent type of dispute relating to 'matrimonial regimes' concerns the winding up of the 'matrimonial regime' after termination of the marriage, particularly after divorce. The 'statutory matrimonial regime' under German law ('Zugewinngemeinschaft' or community of acquisitions) then results in an equalization claim by the spouse whose property has not increased in value to the same extent as that of his partner.

46. Some provisions apply to all marriages, irrespective of the particular 'matrimonial régime' under which spouses live, especially in Germany and France. Significantly the German and French texts of the 1968 Convention use the term in the plural ('die Güterstände', 'les régimes matrimoniaux').

This can be explained as follows: the Code civil, for instance, deals with property aspects of marriage in two different parts of the code. Title V of the third book (on the acquisition of property) refers in detail to the 'contrat de mariage' and then 'régimes matrimoniaux', while property aspects of the relations between spouses are also covered by Articles 212 to 226 in Title V of the first book. The new French divorce law of 11 July 1975 (6) introduced into the new version of Article 270 et seq. of the Code civil equalization payments normally in the form of lump sum compensation (Article 274) which are independent of the particular 'regime' applicable between the spouses. German law in the fourth book of the Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch makes a similar distinction between the legal consequences in respect of property rights which generally follow from marriage (Title V, Article 1353 et seq.) and those which follow from 'matrimonial property law', which varies according to the various 'matrimonial regimes'. Under both systems (Article 1357 (2) of the Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch, Article 220 (2) of the French Code civil) it is possible, for example, to prevent a spouse from engaging in certain legal transactions which he is normally entitled to engage in his capacity as spouse. According to Article 285 of the Code civil (7) the court can, after divorce, make orders concerning the matrimonial home irrespective of the 'matrimonial regime' previously applicable. Similar possibilities exist in other States.

French legal literature refers to provisions concerning property rights which apply to all marriages as 'régime matrimonial primaire'. Other legal systems have no such special expression. It is within the spirit of Article 1, second paragraph, point (1) of the 1968 Convention to exclude those provisions concerning property rights affecting all marriages from its scope of application, in so far as they are not covered by the term 'maintenance claims' (see paragraph 91 et seq.)

In all legal systems of the Community it is possible to conceive of relations affecting rights between spouses which are governed by the general law of contract, law of tort or property law. Some laws contain provisions specifically intended to govern cases where such relations exist between spouses. For example, Article 1595 of the French Code civil contains restrictions on the admissibility of contracts of sale between spouses. Case law has sometimes developed special rules in this field which are designed to take account of the fact that such transactions commonly occur in relations between spouses. All this does not alter the position that legal relations governed by the general law of contract or tort remain subject to the provisions of the 1968 Convention, even if they are between spouses.

47. Finally, legal provisions comprised in the term 'matrimonial regimes' are not limited to relations between the spouses themselves. For example, in Italian law, in connection with the liquidation of a 'fondo patrimoniale' disputes may arise between parents and children (Article 171 (3) of the Codice civile), which under Italian law unequivocally concern relations arising out of 'matrimonial property law' ('il regime patrimoniale della famiglia'). German law contains the regime of 'continued community of property' ('fortgesetzte Gütergemeinschaft'), which forms a link between a surviving spouse and the issue of the marriage.

48. (b) These findings raise problems similar to those with which the Working Pary was faced in connection with the concept 'civil and commercial matters'. It was, however, possible to define the concept of 'matrimonial regimes' not only in a negative manner (paragraph 49), but also positively, albeit rather broadly. This should enable implementing legislation in the United Kingdom and Ireland, in reliance on these statements, to indicate to the courts which legal relations form part of 'matrimonial regimes' within the meaning of the 1968 Convention (paragraph 50). Consequently no formal adjustment of the 1968 Convention became necessary.

49. As a negative definition, it can be said with certainty that in no legal system do maintenance claims between spouses derive from rules governing 'matrimonial regimes'; nor are maintenance claims confined to claims for periodic payments (see paragraph 93).

50. The mutual rights of spouses arising from 'matrimonial régimes' correspond largely with what are best described in English as 'rights in property arising out of a matrimonial relationship'. Apart from maintenance matters property relations between spouses which are governed by the differing legal systems of the original Member States otherwise than as 'matrimonial regimes' only seldom give rise to court proceedings with international aspects.

Thus the following can be said in respect of the scope of point (1) of the second paragraph of Article 1 as far as 'matrimonial regimes' are concerned:

The Convention does not apply to the assumption of jurisdiction by United Kingdom and Irish courts, nor to the recognition and enforcement of foreign judgments by those courts, if the subject matter of the proceedings concerns issues which have arisen between spouses, or exceptionally between a spouse and a third party, during or after dissolution of their marriage, and which affect rights in property arising out of the matrimonial relationship. The expression 'rights in property' includes all rights of administration and disposal — whether by marriage contract or by statute — of property belonging to the spouses.

3. THE REMAINING CONTENTS OF ARTICLE 1, SECOND PARAGRAPH, POINT (1) OF THE 1968 CONVENTION

51. (a) The non-applicability of the 1968 Convention in respect of the status or legal capacity of natural persons concerns in particular proceedings and judgments relating to:

— the voidability and nullity of marriages, and judicial separation,

— the dissolution of marriages,

— the death of a person,

— the status and legal capacity of a minor and the legal representation of a person who is mentally ill; the status and legal capacity of a minor also includes judgments on the right to custody after the divorce or legal separation of the parents; this was the Working Party's unanimous reply to the express question put by the Irish delegation,

— the nationality or domicile (see paragraph 71 et seq.) of a person,

— the care, custody and control of children, irrespective of whether these are in issue in divorce, guardianship, or other proceedings,

— the adoption of children.

However, the 1968 Convention is only inapplicable when the proceedings are concerned directly with legal consequences arising from these matters. It is not sufficient if the issues raised are merely of a preliminary nature, even if their preliminary nature is, or has been, of some importance in the main proceedings.

52. (b) The expression 'wills and succession' covers all claims to testate or intestate succession to an estate. It includes disputes as to the validity or interpretation of the terms of a will setting up a trust, even where the trust takes effect on a date subsequent to the death of the testator. The same applies to proceedings in respect of the application and interpretation of statutory provisions establishing trusts in favour of persons or institutions as a result of a person dying intestate. The 1968 Convention does not, therefore, apply to any disputes concerning the creation, interpretation and administration of trusts arising under the law of succession including wills. On the other hand, disputes concerning the relations of the trustee with persons other than beneficiaries, in other words the 'external relations' of the trust, come within the scope of the 1968 Convention (see paragraph 109 et seq.)

B.

BANKRUPTCY AND SIMILAR PROCEEDINGS

53. Article 1, second paragraph, point (2), occupies a special position among the provisions concerning the legal matters excluded from the 1968 Convention. It was drafted with reference to a special Convention on bankruptcy which was being discussed at the same time as the 1968 Convention.

Leaving aside special bankruptcy rules for very special types of business undertakings, the two Conventions were intended to dovetail almost completely with each other. Consequently, the preliminary draft Convention on bankruptcy, which was first drawn up in 1970, submitted in an amended form in 1975 ([8]), deliberately adopted the principal terms 'bankruptcy', 'compositions' and 'analogous proceedings' ([9]) in the provisons concerning its scope in the same way ([10]) as they were used in the 1968 Convention. To avoid, as far as possible, leaving lacunae between the scope of the two Conventions, efforts are being made in the discussions on the proposed Convention on bankruptcy to enumerate in detail all the principal and secondary proceedings involved ([11]) and so to eliminate any problems of interpretation. As long as the proposed Convention on bankruptcy has not yet come into force, the application of Article 1, second paragraph, point (2) of the 1968 Convention remains difficult. The problems, including the matters arising from the accession of the new Member States, are of two kinds. First, it is necessary to define what proceedings are meant by bankruptcy, compositions or analogous proceedings as well as their constituent parts (1). Secondly, the legal position in the United Kingdom poses a special problem as the bankruptcy of 'incorporated companies' is not a recognized concept in that country (2).

1. GENERAL AND INDIVIDUAL TYPES OF PROCEEDINGS EXCLUDED FROM THE SCOPE OF THE 1968 CONVENTION

54. It is relatively easy to define the basic types of proceedings that are subject to bankruptcy law and therefore fall outside the scope of the 1968 Convention. Such proceedings are defined in almost identical terms in both the Jenard and the Noël-Lemontey reports ([12]) as those > 'which, depending on the system of law involved, are based on the suspension of payments, the insolvency of the debtor or his inability to raise credit, and which involve the judicial authorities for the purpose either of compulsory and collective liquidation of the assets or simply of supervision by those authorities.'

In the legal systems of the original States of the EEC there are only a very few examples of proceedings of this kind, ranging from two (in Germany) to four (Italy and Luxembourg). In its 1975 version ([8]) the Protocol to the preliminary draft Convention on bankruptcy enumerates the proceedings according to types of proceedings and States concerned. A list is reproduced in Annex I to this report. Naturally, the 1968 Convention does not, a fortiori, cover global insolvency proceedings which do not take place before a court as, for example, can be the case in France when authorization can be withdrawn from an insurance undertaking for reasons of insolvency.

The enumeration in Article 17 of the preliminary draft Convention on bankruptcy cannot, before that Convention has come into force, be used for the interpretation of Article 1, second paragraph, point (2) of the 1968 Convention. Article 17 mentions the kind of proceedings especially closely connected with bankruptcy where the courts of the State where the bankruptcy proceedings are opened are to have exclusive jurisdiction.

It is not desirable at this stage to prescribe this list, or even an amended list, as binding. Further amendments may well have to be made during the discussions on the Convention on bankruptcy. To prescribe a binding list would cause confusion, even though the list to be included in the Protocol to the Convention on bankruptcy will, after the latter's entry into force, prevail over the 1968 Convention pursuant to Article 57, since it is part of a special Convention. Moreover, the list, as already mentioned, does not include all bankruptcies, compositions and analogous proceedings. For instance, it has become clear during the discussions on the Convention on bankruptcy that the list will not cover insurance undertakings which only undertake direct insurance ([13]), without thereby bringing the bankruptcy of such undertakings within the scope of the 1968 Convention. Finally the Working Party was not sure whether all the proceedings included in the list as it stood at the beginning of 1976 could properly be regarded as bankruptcies, compositions or analogous proceedings, before the list formally comes into force. This applied particularly to the proceedings mentioned in connection with the liquidation of companies (see paragraph 57).

2. BANKRUPTCY LAW AND THE DISSOLUTION OF COMPANIES

55. As far as dissolution, whether or not by decision of a court, and the capacity to be made bankrupt are concerned, the legal treatment of a partnership (14) established under United Kingdom or Irish law is comparable in every respect to the treatment of companies established under continental legal systems. Companies (15) within the meaning of United Kingdom or Irish law, however, are dealt with in a fundamentally different way. The Bankruptcy Acts do not apply to them (16), but instead they are subject to the winding-up procedure of the Companies Acts (17); even if they are not registered companies. Winding-up is not a special bankruptcy procedure, but a legal concept which can take different forms and serves different purposes. A common feature of all winding-up proceedings is a disposal of assets and the distribution of their proceeds amongst the persons entitled thereto with a view of bringing the company to an end. The start of winding-up proceedings corresponds, therefore, to what is understood by 'dissolution' on the continent. The dissolution of a company on the other hand is identical with the final result of a liquidation under continental legal systems.

A distinction is made between winding-up by the court, voluntary winding-up and winding-up subject to the supervision of the court. The second kind of winding-up takes place basically without the intervention of the court, either at the instance of the members alone or of the members together with the creditors. Only as a subsidiary measure and exceptionally can the court appoint a liquidator. The third kind of winding-up is only a variation on the second. The court has certain supervisory powers. A winding-up of a company by the court requires an application either by the company or by a creditor which is possible in a number of circumstances of which insolvency is only one. Other grounds for a winding-up include: the number of members falling below the required minimum, failure to commence, or a lengthy suspension of, business and the general ground 'that the court is of the opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up'.

56. The legal position outlined has the following consequences for the application of Article 1, second paragraph, point (2), and Article 16 (2) of the 1968 Convention in the Continental (b) and other (a) Member States:

57. (a) A voluntary winding-up under United Kingdom or Irish law cannot be equated with court proceedings. The same applies to the non-judicial proceedings under Danish law for the dissolution of a company. Legal disputes incidental to or consequent upon such proceedings are therefore normal civil or commercial disputes and as such are not excluded from the scope of the 1968 Convention. This also applies in the case of a winding-up subject to the supervision of the court. The powers of the court in such a case are not sufficiently clearly defined for the proceedings to be classed as judicial.

A winding-up by the court cannot, of course, be automatically excluded from the scope of the 1968 Convention. For although most proceedings of this kind serve the purpose of the liquidation of an insolvent company, this is not always the case. The Working Party decided to exclude from the scope of the 1968 Convention only those proceedings which are or were based on Section 222 (e) of the British Companies Act (18) or the equivalent provisions in the legislation of Ireland and Northern Ireland. This would, however, involve too narrow a definition of the proceedings to be excluded, as the liquidation of an insolvent company is frequently based on one of the other grounds referred to in Section 222 of the British Companies Act, notably in (a), which states that a special resolution of the members is sufficient to set proceedings in motion. There is no alternative therefore to ascertaining the determining factor in the dissolution in each particular case. The English version of Article 1, second paragraph, point (2), of the 1968 Convention has been worded accordingly. It was not, however, necessary to alter the text of the Convention in the other languages. If a winding-up in the United Kingdom or Ireland is based on a ground other than the insolvency of the company, the court concerned with recognition and enforcement in another Contracting State will have to examine whether the company was not in fact insolvent. Only if it is of the opinion that the company was solvent will the 1968 Convention apply.

58. Only in that event does the problem arise of whether exclusive jurisdiction exists for the courts at the seat of the company pursuant to Article 16 (2) of the 1968 Convention. In the United Kingdom and Ireland this is the case for proceedings which involve or have involved a solvent company.

The term 'dissolution' in Article 16 (2) of the 1968 Convention is not to be understood in the narrow technical sense in which it is used in legal systems on the Continent. It also covers proceedings concerning the liquidation of a company after 'dissolution'. These include disputes about the amount to be paid out to a member; such proceedings are nothing more than stages on the way towards terminating the legal existence of a company.

59. (b) If a company established under a Continental legal system is dissolved, i.e. enters the stage of liquidation, because it has become insolvent, court proceedings relating to the 'dissolution of the company' are only conceivable as disputes concerning the admissibility of, or the mode and manner of conducting, winding-up proceedings. All this is outside the scope of the 1968 Convention. On the other hand, all other proceedings intended to declare or to bring about the dissolution of a company are not the concern of the law of winding-up. It is unnecessary to examine whether the company concerned is solvent or insolvent. It also makes no difference, if bankruptcy law questions arise as a preliminary issue. For instance, when litigation ensues as to whether a company should be dissolved, because a person who allegedly belongs to it has gone bankrupt, the dispute is not about a matter of bankruptcy law, but of a type which falls within the scope of the 1968 Convention. The Convention also applies if, in connection with the dissolution of a company not involving the courts, third parties contend in legal proceedings that they are creditors of the company and consequently entitled to satisfaction out of assets of the company.

C.

SOCIAL SECURITY

60. Matters relating to social security were expressly excluded from the scope of the 1968 Convention. This was intended to avoid the difficulties which would arise from the fact that in some Member States this area of law comes under public law, whereas in others it is on the border-line between public and private law. Legal proceedings by social security authorities against third parties, for example against wrongdoers, in exercise of rights of action which they have acquired by subrogation or by operation of law, do come within the scope of the 1968 Convention.

ARBITRATION

61. The United Kingdom requested information on matters regarding the effect of the exclusion of 'arbitration' from the scope of the 1968 Convention, which were not dealt with in the Jenard report. Two divergent basic positions which it was not possible to reconcile emerged from the discussion on the interpretation of the relevant provisions of Article 1, second paragraph, point (4). The point of view expressed principally on behalf of the United Kingdom was that this provision covers all disputes which the parties had effectively agreed should be settled by arbitration, including any secondary disputes connected with the agreed arbitration. The other point of view, defended by the original Member States of the EEC, only regards proceedings before national courts as part of 'arbitration' if they refer to arbitration proceedings, whether concluded, in progress or to be started. It was nevertheless agreed that no amendment should be made to the text. The new Member States can deal with this problem of interpretation in their implementing legislation. The Working Party was prepared to accept this conclusion, because all the Member States of the Community, with the exception of Luxembourg and Ireland, had in the meantime become parties to the United Nations Convention of 10 June 1958 on the recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards, and Ireland is willing to give sympathetic consideration to the question of her acceding to it. In any event, the differing basic positions lead to a different result in practice only in one particular instance (see paragraph 62).

1. DECISIONS OF NATIONAL COURTS ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF A DISPUTE DESPITE THE EXISTENCE OF AN ARBITRATION AGREEMENT.

62. If a national court adjudicates on the subject matter of a dispute, because it overlooked an arbitration agreement or considered it inapplicable, can recognition and enforcement of that judgment be refused in another State of the Community on the ground that the arbitration agreement was after all valid and that therefore, pursuant to Article 1, second paragraph, point (4), the judgment falls outside the scope of the 1968 Convention? Only if the first interpretation (see paragraph 61) is accepted can an affirmative answer be given to this question.

In support of the view that this would be the correct course, it is argued that since a court in the State addressed is free, contrary to the view of the court in the State of origin, to regard a dispute as affecting the status of an individual, or the law of succession, or as falling outside the scope of civil law, and therefore as being outside the scope of the 1968 Convention, it must in the same way be free to take the opposite view to that taken by the court of origin and to reject the applicability of the 1968 Convention because arbitration is involved.

Against this, it is contended that the literal meaning of the word 'arbitration' itself implies that it cannot extend to every dispute affected by an arbitration agreement; that 'arbitration' refers only to arbitration proceedings. Proceedings before national courts would therefore be affected by Article 1, second paragraph, point (4) of the 1968 Convention only if they dealt with arbitration as a main issue and did not have to consider the validity of an arbitration agreement merely as a matter incidental to an examination of the competence of the court of origin to assume jurisdiction. It has been contended that the court in the State addressed can no longer re-open the issue of classification; if the court of the State of origin, in assuming jurisdiction, has taken a certain view as to the applicability of the 1968 Convention, this becomes binding on the court in the State addressed.

2. OTHER PROCEEDINGS CONNECTED WITH ARBITRATION BEFORE NATIONAL COURTS

63. (a) The 1968 Convention as such in no way restricts the freedom of the parties to submit disputes to arbitration. This applies even to proceedings for which the 1968 Convention has established exclusive jurisdiction. Nor, of course, does the Convention prevent national legislation from invalidating arbitration agreements affecting disputes for which exclusive jurisdiction exists under national law or pursuant to the 1968 Convention.

64. (b) The 1968 Convention does not cover court proceedings which are ancillary to arbitration proceedings, for example the appointment or dismissal of arbitrators, the fixing of the place of arbitration, the extension of the time limit for making awards or the obtaining of a preliminary ruling on questions of substance as provided for under English law in the procedure known as 'statement of a special case' (Section 21 of the Arbitration Act 1950). In the same way a judgment determining whether an arbitration agreement is valid or not, or because it is invalid, ordering the parties not to continue the arbitration proceedings, is not covered by the 1968 Convention.

65. (c) Nor does the 1968 Convention cover proceedings and decisions concerning applications for the revocation, amendment, recognition and enforcement of arbitration awards. This also applies to court decisions incorporating arbitration awards — a common method of recognition under United Kingdom law. If an arbitration award is revoked and the revoking court or another national court itself decides the subject matter in dispute, the 1968 Convention is applicable.

V. JUDICIAL NATURE OF PROCEEDINGS AND JUDGMENTS

66. As between the original Member States, and also as between those States and the United Kingdom and Ireland, the 1968 Convention could and can in one particular respect be based on a surprisingly uniform legal tradition. Almost everywhere the same tasks pertaining to the field of private law are assigned to the courts. The authorities which constitute 'courts' can everywhere be recognized easily and with certainty. This is also true in cases where proceedings are being conducted in 'court' which are not the result of an action by one party 'against' another party (see paragraphs 23 and 124 et seq.). The accession of Denmark raised new problems.

Although the Working Party had no difficulty in confirming that the Industrial Court under the Danish Industrial Court Act of 21 April 1964 (Bulletin No 124) was, in spite of its unusual structure, clearly to be considered a court within the meaning of the 1968 Convention, it was more difficult to decide how to classify proceedings in maintenance matters, which, in Denmark, failing an amicable settlement, are almost always held before administrative authorities and terminate with a decision by the latter.

1. THE LEGAL POSITION IN DENMARK

67. The legal position may be summed up as follows. Maintenance matters are determined as regards the obligation to pay either by agreement or by a court judgment. The amount of the payment and the scale of any necessary modifications are, however, determined by an authority known as the 'Amtmand', which under Danish law is clearly not a court but an administrative authority which in this case plays a judicial role. It is true that decisions given in such proceedings come under The Hague Convention on the recognition and enforcement of decisions relating to maintenance obligations, but this is only because under that Convention the matter does not specifically require a court judgment.

2. ARTICLE Va OF THE PROTOCOL AND ITS EFFECT

68. There would, however, be an imbalance in the scope of the 1968 Convention, if it excluded maintenance proceedings of the type found in Denmark on the sole ground that they do not take place before courts.

The amendment to the 1968 Convention thus made necessary is contained in the proposal for the adoption of a new Article Va in the Protocol. This method appeared simpler than attempting to amend a large number of separate provisions of the 1968 Convention.

Wherever the 1968 Convention refers to 'court' or 'judge' it must in the future be taken to include Danish administrative authorities when dealing with maintenance matters (as in Article 2, first paragraph, Article 3, first paragraph, Article 4, first paragraph, Article 5 (2), Article 17, Article 18, Articles 20 to 22, Article 27 (4), Article 28, third paragraph and Article 52). This applies in particular to Article 4, first paragraph, even though in the French, Italian and Dutch texts, unlike the German version, the word 'court' does not appear.

Similarly, wherever the 1968 Convention refers to 'judgments', the decisions arrived at by the Danish administrative authorities in maintenance matters will in future be included in the legal definition of the term 'judgment' contained in Article 25. Its content is extended in this respect by the addition of Article Va to the Protocol, so that it is now to be understood as reading:

> 'For the purposes of this Convention, "judgment" means any judgment given by a court or tribunal of a Contracting State — including in matters relating to maintenance, the Danish administrative authorities — whatever the judgment may be called . . .'.

CHAPTER 4

GENERAL REMARKS

69. In section A of Chapter 4 of his report, Mr. Jenard sets out the main ideas underlying the rules of jurisdiction of the 1968 Convention. None of this is affected by the accession of the new Member States. The extent to which three features of the law in the United Kingdom and in Ireland are consistent with the application of the 1968 Convention must, however, be clarified. These features are: the far-reaching jurisdiction of the Superior Courts (1), the concept of domicile (2) and, lastly, the discretionary powers enjoyed by the courts to determine territorial jurisdiction (3).

1. FIRST INSTANCE JURISDICTION OF THE SUPERIOR COURTS

70. The Continental Member States of the Community have geographically defined jurisdictions where courts of first instance are competent to give judgments even in the most important civil disputes. There are many courts of equal status: approximately 50 'Landgerichte' in Germany, and an equal number of 'tribunaux de grande instance' in France and 'Tribunali' in Italy. Where the 1968 Convention itself lays down both the international and local jurisdiction of the courts, as for example in Articles 5 and 6, jurisdiction is given to only one of the many courts with equal status in a State. There is little room for such a distinction in the judicial systems of Ireland and the United Kingdom in so far as a Superior Court has jurisdiction as a court of first instance.

In Ireland, the High Court is the only court of first instance with unlimited jurisdiction. It can, exceptionally, sit outside Dublin. Nothing in the 1968 Convention precludes this. In addition to the High Court, there is a Circuit Court and a District Court. In respect of these courts too, the expression 'the Court' is used in the singular and there is only one Court for the whole country, but each of its judges is permanently assigned to a specific circuit or district. The local jurisdiction laid down in the 1968 Convention means, in the case of Ireland, the judge assigned to a certain 'circuit' or 'district'.

In the United Kingdom three Superior Courts have jurisdiction at first instance: the High Court of Justice for England and Wales, the Outer House of the Court of Session for Scotland and the High Court for Northern Ireland. Each of these courts has, however, exclusive jurisdiction for the entire territory of the relevant part of the United Kingdom (see paragraph 11). Thus the same comments as those made in connection with the territorial jurisdiction of the Irish High Court apply also to each judicial area. The possibility of transferring a case from London to a district registry of the High Court does not mean transfer to another court. Bearing in mind that foreign judgments have to be registered separately in respect of each of the judicial areas of the United Kingdom in order to become enforceable therein (see paragraph 208), the distinction between international and local jurisdiction becomes largely irrelevant in the United Kingdom. The rules in the 1968 Convention governing local jurisdiction are relevant to the Superior Courts of first instance in the United Kingdom only in so far as a distinction has to be made between the courts of England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. The competence of the other courts (County Courts, Magistrates' Courts, and, in Scotland, the Sheriff Courts) presents no particular problems.

2. THE CONCEPT OF 'DOMICILE' AND THE APPLICATION OF THE CONVENTION

71. (a) The concept of domicile is of fundamental importance for the 1968 Convention in determining jurisdiction (e.g. Articles 2 to 6, 8, 11, 12 (3), 14, 17 and 32). In the legal systems of the original Member States of the EEC, its meaning differs to some extent. In the Federal Republic of Germany, it expresses a person's connection with a local community within the national territory. In France and Luxembourg, it denotes a person's exact address. In Belgium, for purposes of jurisdiction the term denotes the place where a person is entered in the register of population as having his principal residence (Article 36 of the Code judiciaire). These differences explain why, in determining a person's domicile, e.g. German law places greater emphasis on the stability of the connection with a specific place than do some of the other legal systems.

Notwithstanding these differences the basic concept of 'domicile' is the same in all the legal systems of the original Member States of the EEC, namely the connection of a person with a smaller local unit within the State. This made it possible in Article 52 of the 1968 Convention to leave a more precise definition of the term to the law of the State in which the 'domicile' of a person had to be ascertained. It did not lead to an uneven application of the provisions of the 1968 Convention. Clearly, for the purposes of applying them in the original Member States of the Community it is irrelevant whether the concept of domicile refers to a specific address or to a local community.

72. (b) The concept of domicile under the law in Ireland and the United Kingdom differs considerably in several respects from the Continental concept.

First, this concept does not refer to a person's connection with a particular place and even less with a particular residence within a place, but to his having his roots within a territory covered by a particular legal system (see paragraph 11). A person's domicile only indicates whether he comes under the legal system of England and Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland, or possibly under a foreign legal system. A person's legal connection with a particular place is denoted by the word 'residence', not 'domicile'.

According to United Kingdom law, a person always has one 'domicile' and can never have more than one. At birth a legitimate child acquires the domicile of its father, an illegitimate child that of its mother. A child retains its domicile of its parents throughout its minority.

After it reaches its majority, it may acquire another domicile but for this there are very strict requirements: the usual place of residence must have been transferred to another country — with the intention of keeping it there permanently or at least for an unlimited period.

73. (c) Article 52 of the 1968 Convention does not expressly provide for the linking of the concept of domicile with a particular place or a particular residence, nor does it expressly prohibit it from being connected with a particular national territory. The United Kingdom and Ireland would, consequently, be free to retain their traditional concept of domicile when the jurisdiction of their courts is invoked. The Working Party came to the conclusion that this would lead to a certain imbalance in the application of the 1968 Convention. In certain cases, the courts of the United Kingdom or Ireland could assume jurisdiction on the basis of their rules on the retention of domicile, although by the law of all the other Member States of the Community, such a person would be domiciled at his actual place of residence within their territory.

The Working Party therefore requested the United Kingdom and Ireland to provide in their legislation implementing the 1968 Convention (see paragraph 256), at any rate for the purposes of that Convention, for a concept of domicile which would depart from their traditional rules and would tend to reflect more the concept of 'domicile' as understood in the original States of the EEC.

In Article 69 (5) of the Convention for the European patent for the common market which was drawn up concurrently with the Working Party's discussions, the concept of 'Wohnsitz' is translated as 'residence' and for the meaning of the expression reference is made to Articles 52 and 53 of the 1968 Convention. To prevent confusion, the proposed new Article Vc of the Protocol makes it clear that the concept of 'residence' within the meaning of the Community Patent Convention should be ascertained in the same way as the concept of 'domicile' in the 1968 Convention.

74. (d) It should be noted that the application of the third paragraph of Article 52 raises the problem of different concepts of domicile, when considering which system of law determines whether a person's domicile depends on that of another person. The relevant factor, in such a case, may be where the dependent person is domiciled. Under United Kingdom private international law, the question whether a person has a dependent domicile is not determined by that person's nationality, but by his domicile in the traditional sense of that concept. The re-definition of 'domicile' in connection with the first paragraph of Article 52 in no way affects this.

If a foreigner under age who has settled in England is sued in an English court, that court must take account of the different concepts of domicile. As a first step it must establish where the defendant had his 'domicile' before settling in England. This is decided in accordance with the traditional meaning of that concept. The law thus found to be applicable will then determine whether the minor was in a position to acquire a 'domicile' in England within the meaning of the 1968 Convention. The English court must then ascertain whether the requirements for a 'domicile' in the area covered by the English court concerned are satisfied.

75. (e) There is no equivalent in the law of the United Kingdom to the concept of the 'seat' of a company in Continental law. In order to achieve the results which under private international law are linked on the continent with the 'seat' of a company, the United Kingdom looks to the legal system where the company was incorporated ('law of incorporation', Section 406 of the Companies Act, 1948). The 'domicile' of a company in the traditional sense of the term (see paragraph 72) is taken to be the judicial area in which it was incorporated. The new Member States of the Community are not obliged to introduce a legal concept which corresponds to that of a company's 'seat' within the meaning of the continental legal systems, just as in general they are not obliged to adapt their concept of domicile. However, should the United Kingdom and Ireland not change their law on this point, the result would again be an imbalance in the application of the 1968 Convention. It would, therefore, be desirable for the United Kingdom to introduce for the purposes of the Convention an appropriate concept in its national legislation such as 'domicile of a company', which would correspond more closely to the Continental concept of the 'seat' of a company than the present United Kingdom concept of 'law of incorporation'.

Such a provision would not preclude a company from having a 'domicile' in the United Kingdom in accordance with legislation in the United Kingdom and a 'seat' in a Continental State in accordance with the legislation of that State. As a result of the second sentence of Article 53, a company is enabled under the laws of several of the original States of the EEC to have a 'seat' in more than one State. The problems which might arise from such a situation can be overcome by the provisions in the 1968 Convention on lis pendens and related actions (see paragraph 162).

3. DISCRETIONARY POWERS REGARDING JURISDICTION AND TRANSFER OF PROCEEDINGS

76. The idea that a national court has discretion in the exercise of its jurisdiction either territorially or as regards the subject matter of a dispute does not generally exist in Continental legal systems. Even where, in the rules relating to jurisdiction, tests of an exceptionally flexible nature are laid down, no room is left for the exercise of any discretionary latitude. It is true that Continental legal systems recognize the power of a court to transfer proceedings from one court to another. Even then the court has no discretion in determining whether or not this power should be exercised. In contrast, the law in the United Kingdom and in Ireland has evolved judicial discretionary powers in certain fields. In some cases, these correspond in practice to legal provisions regarding jurisdiction which are more detailed in the Continental States, while in others they have no counterpart on the Continent. It is therefore difficult to evaluate such powers within the context of the 1968 Convention. A distinction has to be made between the international and national application of this legal concept.

77. (a) In relationships with the courts of other States and also, within the United Kingdom, as between the courts of different judicial areas (see paragraph 11) the doctrine of forum conveniens — in Scotland, forum non conveniens — is of relevance.

The courts are allowed, although only in very rare and exceptional cases, to disregard the fact that proceedings may already be pending before foreign courts, or courts of another judicial area.

Exceptionally, the courts may refuse to hear or decide a case, if they believe it would be better for the case to be heard before a court having equivalent jurisdiction in another State (or another judicial area) because this would increase the likelihood of an efficient and impartial hearing of the particular case.

There are several special reasons why in practice such discretionary powers are exercised: the strict requirements traditionally imposed by the laws of the United Kingdom and Ireland regarding changes of domicile (see paragraph 72); the rules allowing establishment of jurisdiction by merely serving a writ or originating summons in the territory of the State concerned (see paragraphs 85 and 86); the principles developed particularly strongly in the procedural law of these States requiring directness in the taking of evidence with the consequent restrictions on making use of evidence taken abroad or merely in another judicial area; and finally, the considerable difficulties arising in the application of foreign law by United Kingdom or Irish courts.

78. According to the views of the delegations from the Continental Member States of the Community such possibilities are not open to the courts of those States when, under the 1968 Convention, they have jurisdiction and are asked to adjudicate.

Article 21 expressly prohibits a court from disregarding the fact that proceedings are already pending abroad. For the rest the view was expressed that under the 1968 Convention the Contracting States are not only entitled to exercise jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions laid down in Title 2; they are also obliged to do so. A plaintiff must be sure which court has jurisdiction. He should not have to waste his time and money risking that the court concerned may consider itself less competent than another. In particular, in accordance with the general spirit of the 1968 Convention, the fact that foreign law has to be applied, either generally or in a particular case, should not constitute a sufficient reason for a court to decline jurisdiction. Where the courts of several States have jurisdiction, the plaintiff has deliberately been given a right of choice, which should not be weakened by application of the doctrine of forum conveniens. The plaintiff may have chosen another apparently 'inappropriate' court from among the competent courts in order to obtain a judgment in the State in which he also wishes to enforce it. Furthermore, the risk of a negative conflict of jurisdiction should not be disregarded: despite the United Kingdom court's decision, the judge on the Continent could likewise decline jurisdiction. The practical reasons in favour of the doctrine of forum conveniens will lose considerably in significance, as soon as the 1968 Convention becomes applicable in the United Kingdom and Ireland. The implementing legislation will necessitate not inconsiderable changes in the laws of those States, both in respect of the definition of the concept of domicile (see paragraph 73) and on account of the abolition of jurisdictional competence based merely on service of a writ within the area of the court (see paragraph 86). To correct rules of jurisdiction in a particular case by means of the concept of forum conveniens will then be largely unnecessary. After considering these arguments the United Kingdom and Irish delegations did not press for a formal adjustment of the 1968 Convention on this point.

79. (b) A concept similar to the doctrine of forum conveniens is also applied within the territory of the State, though the term itself is not used in that context. This may be due to the fact that the same result can be achieved by the device of transferring the case to another court having alternative jurisdiction within the same State or the same legal area (see paragraph 11). The Working Party had to examine to what extent the 1968 Convention restricted such powers of transfer. In this connection certain comments made earlier may be repeated: the powers of the Superior Courts in Ireland or in a judicial area of the United Kingdom (see paragraph 70) to decide as a court of first instance remain unchanged. For the rest, the following applies:

80. (aa) The previous legal position in Ireland and the United Kingdom remains essentially the same. Each court can transfer proceedings to another court, if that court has equivalent jurisdiction and can better deal with the matter. For example, if an action is brought before the High Court, the value of which is unlikely to exceed the amount which limits the jurisdiction of the lower court, the High Court has power to transfer the proceedings to such a court, but it is not obliged to do so. A Circuit Court in Ireland, a County Court or Magistrates' Court in England and a Sheriff Court in Scotland — but not an Irish District Court (see paragraph 70) — may transfer proceedings to another court of the same category or exceptionally to a court of another category, if the location of the evidence or the circumstances for a fair hearing should make such a course desirable in the interest of the parties.

Some Continental legal systems also provide for the possibility, albeit on a much smaller scale, of a judge having discretion to confer jurisdiction on a court which would not otherwise have it. This is the case under, for instance, Article 36 of the German Code of Civil Procedure, if proper proceedings are not possible before the court which originally had jurisdiction. Under Section 356 of the new French Code of Civil Procedure ([19]) proceedings may be transferred to another court of the same type, if a risk of lack of impartiality exists.

81. (bb) The 1968 Convention in no way affects the competence as regards subject matter of the courts of a State. The national legal systems are thus free to provide for the possibility of transfer of cases between courts of different categories.

For the most part, the 1968 Convention does not affect the territorial jurisdiction of the courts within a State, but only their international jurisdiction. This is clearly reflected by the basic rule on jurisdiction contained in Article 2. Unless the jurisdiction of a court where proceedings are instituted against a person domiciled in the United Kingdom or Ireland is derived from a provision of the 1968 Convention which at the same time determines local jurisdiction, as for example Article 5, the 1968 Convention does not prevent a transfer of the proceedings to another court in the same State. Even in respect of exclusive jurisdiction, Article 16 only lays down the international jurisdiction of the courts of a State, and does not prevent a transfer within that State.

Finally, the 1968 Convention does not of course prevent a transfer to the court which actually has local jurisdiction under the Convention. This would occur where both parties agree to the transfer and the requirements for jurisdiction by consent pursuant to Article 17 are satisfied.

The only type of case which remains problematic is where an action is brought before a court in circumstances where the 1968 Convention gives the plaintiff a choice of jurisdiction. An action in tort or a liability insurance claim is brought at the place where the harmful event occurred or a maintenance claim at the domicile of the maintenance creditor. It appears obvious that in special exceptional cases a transfer to another court of the same State must be permitted, when proper proceedings are not possible before the court which would otherwise have jurisdiction. However, the Working Party did not feel justified in incorporating these matters expressly in the 1968 Conventation. They could be covered by a rule of interpretation to the effect that the court having local jurisdiction may, in exceptional cases, include the court which is designated as having local jurisdiction by the decision of another court. The courts for the place 'where the harmful event occurred' could thus be a neighbouring court designated by another court, if the courts for the place of the harmful event should be unable to hear the proceedings.

In so far as a court's discretionary powers to confer jurisdiction on other courts and in particular to transfer proceedings to another court are not defined in detail such discretionary powers should, of course, only be used in the spirit of the 1968 Convention, if the latter has determined, not only international but also local jurisdiction. A transfer merely on account of the cost of the proceedings or in order to facilitate the taking of evidence would be possible only with the consent of the plaintiff, who had the choice of jurisdiction.

B.

COMMENTS ON THE SECTIONS OF TITLE II

Section 1

General provisions

82. The proposed adjustments to Articles 2 ([20]) to 4 are confined to inserting certain exorbitant jurisdictions in the legal systems of the new Member States into the second paragraph of Article 3. The occasion has been taken to adjust the text of that Article to take account also of an amendment to the law which has been introduced in Belgium. Detailed comments on the proposed alterations (I) precede two more general remarks on the relevance of this provision to the whole structure of the 1968 Convention (II).

I. Detailed comments

83. 1. Belgium

In Belgium, Articles 52, 52 bis and 53 of the law of 25 March 1876 had already been superseded before the coming into force of the 1968 Convention by Articles 635, 637 and 638 of the Judicial Code. Nevertheless only Article 638 of the Judicial Code is mentioned in the second paragraph of Article 3 in its revised version. It corresponds to Article 53 of the law of 25 March 1876 and provides that where Belgian courts do not possess jurisdiction based on other provisions, a plaintiff resident in Belgium may sue any person before the court of his place of residence. The version of Article 3, valid hitherto, erroneously classed the jurisdiction based on Articles 52 and 52 bis of the abovementioned law as exorbitant.

84. 2. Denmark

The provisions of Danish law included in the second paragraph of Article 3 state that a foreigner may be sued before any Danish court in whose district he is resident or has property when the document instituting the proceedings is served. On this last point the provision corresponds to similar German provisions included in the list of exorbitant jurisdictions. On the first point reference may be made to what follows concerning Ireland (see paragraph 85). There is a separate Code of Civil Procedure for Greenland (see paragraph 253); special reference had therefore to be made to the corresponding provisions affecting that country.

85. 3. Ireland

According to the principles of common law which are unwritten and apply equally in the United Kingdom and Ireland, a court has jurisdiction in principle if the plaintiff has been properly served with the court process. The jurisdiction of Irish (and United Kingdom) courts is indirectly restricted to the extent of the limits imposed on the service of a writ of summons. Service is available without special leave only within the territory of Ireland (or the United Kingdom). However, every service validly effected there is sufficient to establish jurisdiction; even a short stay by the defendant in the territory concerned will suffice. Service abroad will be authorized only where certain specified conditions are satisfied. As regards legal relations within the EEC — especially because of the possibility of free movement of judgments resulting from the 1968 Convention — there is no longer any justification for founding the jurisdiction of a court on the mere temporary presence of a person in the State of the court concerned. This common law jurisdiction, for which of course no statutory enactment can be cited, had therefore to be classed as exorbitant.

86. 4. United Kingdom

As regards the United Kingdom it will suffice for point (a) of Article 3, second paragraph, of the 1968 Convention as amended, to refer to what has been said above in the case of Ireland. Points (b) and (c) deal with some characteristic features of Scottish law. To establish jurisdiction merely by service of a writ of summons during the temporary presence of the defendant is a rare, though not totally unknown, practice in Scotland. Scottish courts usually base their jurisdiction in respect of a defendant not permanently resident there on other factors, namely that he has been in Scotland for at least 40 days, or that he owns immovable property in Scotland or that he owns movable property which has been impounded in Scotland. In such cases service on the defendant is also required, but this may be effected by post or, exceptionally, by posting it on the court notice board. In the case of Germany, the 1968 Convention has already classed jurisdiction based solely on the existence of property in Germany as exorbitant. Any jurisdiction based solely on the seizure of property within a country must be treated in the same way.

II. The relevance of the second paragraph of Article 3 to the whole structure of the 1968 Convention

87. 1. The special significance of the second paragraph of Article 3

The rejection as exorbitant of jurisdictional bases hitherto considered to be important in the new Member States should not, any more than the original version of the second paragraph of Article 3, mislead anyone into thinking that the scope of the first paragraph of Article 3 would thereby be more closely circumscribed. Only particularly extravagant claims to international jurisdiction by the courts of a Member State are expressly underlined. Other rules founding jurisdiction in the national laws of the new Member States are compatible with the 1968 Convention also only to the extent that they do not offend against Article 2 and Articles 4 to 18. Thus, for example, the jurisdiction of English courts in respect of persons domiciled in the Community can no longer be based on the ground that the claim concerns a contract which was concluded in England or is governed by English law. On the other hand, the rules on the jurisdiction of English courts in connection with breaches of contract in England or claims connected with the commission or omission of an act in England largely correspond to the provisions in Article 5 (1) to (3).

2. Impossibility of founding jurisdiction on the location of property

88. With regard to Germany, Denmark and the United Kingdom the list in the second paragraph of Article 3 contains provisions rejecting jurisdiction derived solely from the existence of property in the territory of the State in which the court is situated. Such jurisdiction cannot be asserted even if the proceedings concern a dispute over rights of ownership, or possession, or the capacity to dispose of the specific property in question. Persons domiciled on the Continent of Europe may not be sued in Scotland, even if the aim of the action is to recover movable property situated or seized there or to determine its ownership. Interpleader actions (England and Wales) and multiple poinding (Scotland) are no longer permissible in the United Kingdom in respect of persons domiciled in another Member State of the Community, in so far as the international jurisdiction of the English or Scottish courts does not result from other provisions of the 1968 Convention. This applies, for example, to actions brought by an auctioneer to establish whether ownership of an article sent to him for disposal belongs to his customer or a third party claiming the article.

There is, however, no reason why United Kingdom legislation should not introduce appropriate measures pursuant to Article 24, to provide protection to persons (such as auctioneers) faced with conflicting legal claims. This might, for instance, take the form of a court order authorizing an article to be temporarily withdrawn from auction.

As regards persons who are domiciled outside the Community, the provisions which hitherto governed the jurisdiction of courts in the new Member States remains unaffected. Even the rules of jurisdiction mentioned in the second paragraph of Article 3 may continue to apply to such persons. Judgments delivered by courts which thus have jurisdiction must also be recognized and enforced in other States of the Community unless one of the exceptions in the new paragraph 5 of Article 27 or in Article 59 as amended applies.

This latter provision is the only one concerning which the list in Article 3, second paragraph is not only of illustrative significance but has direct and restrictive importance. (see paragraph 249).

Section 2

Special jurisdictions [21]

89. In the sphere of special, non-exclusive jurisdictions the problems of adjustment were confined to judicial competence as regards maintenance claims (I), questions raised by trusts in United Kingdom and Irish law (II) and problems in connection with jurisdiction in maritime cases (III). In addition, the Working Party dealt with a few less important individual questions (IV).

Reference should be made here to the Judgments of the Court of Justice of the European Communities of 6 October 1976 (12/76; 14/76) and of 30 November 1976 (21/76) which were delivered shortly before or after the end of the negotiations [22].

I. Maintenance claims

90. The need for an adjustment of Article 5 (2) arose because the laws of the new Member States — as was also by then the case with the laws of many of the original States of the EEC — allow status proceedings to be combined with proceedings concerning maintenance claims (see paragraphs 32 to 42). As far as other problems were concerned no formal adjustment was required. However, certain special features of United Kingdom and Irish law give rise to questions of interpretation; the views of the Working Party as to their solutions should be recorded. They concern a more precise definition of the term 'maintenance' (1) and how maintenance entitlements are to be adjusted to changed circumstances in accordance with the system of jurisdiction and recognition established by the 1968 Convention (2).

1. The term 'maintenance'

91. (a) The 1968 Convention refers simply to 'maintenance' in Article 5 (2), the only Article which uses the expression. Several legal concepts used within one and the same national legal system can be covered by this term. For example, Italian law speaks of 'alimenti' (Article 433 et seq. of the codice civile) to indicate payments amongst relations and spouses, but payments after divorce are 'assegni' [23]. The new French divorce law [24], too, does not speak of 'aliments', but of 'devoir de secours'. In addition French legal terminology uses the expressions 'devoir d'entretien' and 'contribution aux charges du ménage'. All those are 'maintenance' within the meaning of Article 5 (2) of the 1968 Convention.

92. (b) The Article says nothing, however, about the legal basis from which maintenance claims can emanate. The wording differs markedly from that of the Hague Convention of 2 October 1973 on the recognition and enforcement of decisions relating to maintenance obligations. Article 1 of that Convention excludes from its scope maintenance claims arising from tort, contract and the law of succession. However, there is no significant difference regarding the concept of maintenance as used in the two Conventions. The 1968 Convention is in any case not applicable to maintenance claims under the law of succession (second paragraph, point (1) of Article 1). 'Maintenance' claims as the legal consequence of a tortious act are, in legal theory, claims for damages, even if the amount of compensation depends on the needs of the injured party. Contracts creating a 'maintenance' obligation which previously did not exist are, according to the form employed, gifts, contracts of sale or other contracts for a consideration. Obligations arising therefrom, even where they consist in the payment of 'maintenance', are to be treated like other contractual obligations. In such cases Article 5 (1) rather than 5 (2) of the 1968 Convention applies as far as jurisdiction is concerned; the outcome hardly differs from an application of Article 5 (2). 'Maintenance' obligations created by contract are generally to be fulfilled at the domicile or habitual residence of the maintenance creditor. Thus actions may also be brought there. Article 5 (2) is applicable, however, where a maintenance contract merely crystallizes an existing maintenance obligation which originated from a family relationship.

Judicial proceedings concerning 'maintenance' claims are still civil and commercial matters even where Article 5 (2) is not applicable because the claim arises from a tortious act or a contract.

93. (c) The concept of maintenance does not stipulate that the claim must be for periodic payments. Under Article 1613 (2) of the German Civil Code, for example, the maintenance creditor may in addition to regular payments, claim payment of a lump sum on the ground of exceptional need. Under Article 1615 (e) of the Code a father may agree with his illegitimate child on the payment of a lump sum settlement. Article 5 (4), third sentence, of the Italian divorce law of 1 December 1970 allows divorced spouses to agree on the payment of maintenance in the form of a lump sum settlement. Finally, under Article 285 of the French Civil Code, as amended by the divorce law of 11 July 1975, the French courts can order maintenance in the form of a single capital payment even without the agreement of the spouses. The mere fact that the courts in the United Kingdom have power to order not only periodic payments by one spouse to the other after a divorce, but also the payment of a single lump sum of money, does not therefore prevent the proceedings or a judgment from being treated as a maintenance matter. Even the creation of charges on property and the transfer of property as provided on the Continent, for example in Article 8 of the Italian divorce law, can be in the nature of maintenance.

94. (d) It is difficult to distinguish between claims for maintenance on the one hand and claims for damages and the division of property on the other.

95. (aa) In Continental Europe a motivating factor in assessing the amount of maintenance due to a divorced spouse by his former partner is to compensate an innocent spouse for his loss of matrimonial status. A typical example is contained in Article 301 of the Civil Code in its original form, which still applies in Luxembourg. In its two paragraphs a sharp distinction is drawn in respect of post-matrimonial relations between a claim for maintenance and compensation for material and non-material damages. Yet material damages generally consist in the loss of the provision of maintenance which the divorced party would have enjoyed as a spouse. Thus the claims deriving from the two paragraphs of Article 301 of the Civil Code overlap in practice, especially since they can both take the form of a pension or a single capital payment. It remains to be seen whether the new French divorce law of 11 July 1975, which makes a clearer distinction between 'prestations compensatoires' and 'devoir de secours', will change this situation.

Under Section 23 (1) (c) and (f) and Section 27 (6) (c) of the English Matrimonial causes Act 1973, an English divorce court, too, may order a lump sum to be paid by one divorced spouse to the other or to a child. However, English law, which is characterized by judicial discretionary powers and which does not favour inflexible systematic rules, does not make a distinction as to whether the payments ordered by the Court are intended as damages or as maintenance.

96. (bb) The 1968 Convention is not applicable at all where the payments claimed or ordered are governed by matrimonial property law (see paragraph 45 et seq). Where claims for damages are involved, Article 5 (2) is not relevant. Whether or not that provision applies depends, in the case of a lump sum payment, solely on whether a payment under family law is in the nature of maintenance.

The maintenance nature of the payment is likely to predominate in relation to children. As between spouses, a division of property or damages may well be the underlying factor. Where both spouses are earning well, payment of a lump sum can only serve the purpose of a division of property or compensation for non-material damage. In that case the obligation to pay is not in the nature of maintenance. If payment is in pursuance of a division of property, the 1968 Convention does not apply at all. If it is to compensate for non-material damage, there is no scope for the application of Article 5 (2). A divorce court may not adjudicate in the matter in either case, unless it has jurisdiction under Article 2 or Article 5 (1).

97. (e) All legal systems have to deal with the problems of how the needs of a person requiring financial support are to be met when the maintenance debtor defaults. Others also liable to provide maintenance, if necessary a public authority, may have to step in temporarily. They, in turn, should be able to obtain a refund of their outlay from the (principal) maintenance debtor. Legal systems have therefore evolved various methods to overcome this problem. Some of them provide for the maintenance claim to be transferred to the payer, thereby giving it a new creditor, but not otherwise changing its nature. Others confer on the payer an independent right to compensation. United Kingdom law makes particular use of the latter method in cases where the Supplementary Benefits Commission has paid maintenance. As already mentioned in the Jenard report ([25]) claims of this type are covered by the 1968 Convention, even where claims for compensation are based on a payment made by a public authority in accordance with administrative law or under provisions of social security legislation. It is not, however, the purpose of the special rules of jurisdiction in Article 5 (2) to confer jurisdiction in respect of compensation claims on the courts of the domicile of the maintenance creditor or even those of the seat of the public authority — whichever of the two abovementioned methods a legal system may have opted for.

2. Adjustment of maintenance orders

98. Economic circumstances in general and the particular economic position of those obliged to pay and those entitled to receive maintenance are constantly changing. The need for periodical adjustments of maintenance orders arises particularly in times of creeping inflation. Jurisdiction to order adjustments depends on the general provisions of the 1968 Convention. Since this is a problem of great practical importance it may be appropriate to preface its discussion in detail with a brief comparative legal survey.

99. (a) Continental legal systems differ according to whether the emphasis of the relevant legal provisions is placed on the concept of an infringement of the principle of finality of a maintenance judgment or more on the concept of an adjustment of the question of the claim (aa). In this respect, as in many others, the provisions of United Kingdom (bb) and Irish (cc) law do not fit into this scheme.

100. (aa) The provisions of German law relating to adjustments of maintenance orders are based on the concept of a special procedural remedy in the nature of a review of the proceedings (Wiederaufnahmeklage).

Since there are no special provisions governing jurisdiction, the general provisions governing jurisdiction in maintenance claims are considered applicable. This means that the original court making the maintenance order may have lost its competence to adjust it. Enforcement authorities, even when they are courts, have no power, either in general or in maintenance cases, to adjust a judgment to changed circumstances. Provisions giving protection against enforcement of a judgment for social reasons apply irrespective of whether or not the amount ordered to be paid in the judgment is subject to variation. This is also true regarding the subsidiary provision of Article 765 (a) of the Zivilprozessordnung (Code of Civil Procedure) ([26]), which is of general application and states that enforcement measures may be rescinded or disallowed in very special circumstances, if they constitute an undue hardship for the debtor.

Accordingly legal theory and case law accept that a foreign maintenance order may be adjusted by a German court, if the latter has jurisdiction ([27]).

In the legal systems in the other original Member States of the EEC the problem has always been regarded as one of substantive law and not as a remedy providing protection against enforcement of judicial decisions. Accordingly jurisdiction depends on the general principles applying to maintenance cases ([28]). Indirect adjustments cannot be obtained by invoking, as a defence against measures of enforcement, a change in the circumstances which were taken into account in determining the amount of the maintenance.

In general, the 1968 Convention is based on a similar legal position obtaining in all the original Member States: in the case of proceedings for adjustment of a maintenance order the jurisdiction of the court concerned has to be examined afresh.

101. (bb) In the United Kingdom, the most important legal basis for amendment of maintenance orders is Section 53 of the Magistrates' Courts Act of 1952 in conjunction with Sections 8 to 10 of the Matrimonial proceedings (Magistrates' Courts) Act 1960 which will be suspended in 1979 by the Domestic proceedings and Magistrates' Courts Act 1978. According to these Acts, the Court may revoke or vary maintenance orders, or revive them after they have been revoked or varied. In addition, the court in whose district the applicant is now resident also has jurisdiction in such matters ([29]). In principle, the court's discretion is unfettered in such cases, but an application for variation may not be based on facts or evidence which could have been relied on when the original order was made ([30]). The same applies under Section 31 of the Matrimonial causes Act 1973. A divorce court can vary or discharge an order it has made with regard to maintenance, irrespective of whether the original basis for its jurisdiction still exists or not.

102. To these possibilities must be added another characteristic aspect of the British judicial system. Enforcement of judgments is linked much more closely than on the Continent to the jurisdiction of the particular court which gave the judgment (see paragraph 208). Before a judgment can be enforced by the executive organs of another court, it must be registered with that other court. After registration, it is regarded as a judgment of that court. A further consequence is that, after such registration, the court with which it is registered is empowered to amend it. Hitherto, the United Kingdom has also applied this system in cases where foreign maintenance judgments have been registered with a British court to be enforced in the United Kingdom ([31]).

103. (cc) In Ireland the District Court has jurisdiction to make maintenance orders in respect of spouses and children of a marriage and also in respect of illegitimate children. The Court also has power to vary or revoke its maintenance orders. The jurisdiction of the Court is exercised by the judge for the district where either of the parties to the proceedings is ordinarily resident or carries on any profession or occupation or, in the case of illegitimate children, the judge for the district in which the mother of the child resides. A judge who makes a maintenance order loses jurisdiction to vary it if these requirements as to residence, etc., are no longer fulfilled. Apart from the possibility of having a maintenance order varied there is a right of appeal to the Circuit Court from such orders made by the District Court. The Circuit Court also has jurisdiction to make maintenance orders in proceedings relating to the guardianship of infants. It may also vary or revoke its maintenance orders. Its jurisdiction is exercised by the judge for the circuit in which the defendant is ordinarily resident at the date of application for maintenance or at the date of application for a variation of a maintenance order, as the case may be. An appeal lies to the High Court.

The High Court may order maintenance to be paid, including alimony pending suit and permanent alimony following the granting of divorce a mensa et thoro. It has jurisdiction to vary its own maintenance orders and appeals against its orders lie to the Supreme Court.

104. (b) Although it nowhere states this expressly, the 1968 Convention is based on the principle that all judgments given in a Member State can be contested in that State by all the legal remedies available under the law of that State, even when the basis on which the competence of the courts of that State was founded no longer exists. In France, a French judgment may be contested by an appeal, appeal in cassation and an application to set aside a conviction, even if the defendant has long since ceased to be domiciled in France. It follows from the obligation of recognition that no Contracting State can claim jurisdiction with regard to appeals against judgments given in another Contracting State. This also covers proceedings similar to an appeal, such as an action of reduction in Scotland or a 'Wiederaufnahmeklage' in Germany. Conversely, every claim to jurisdiction which is not based on proceedings to pursue a remedy by way of appeal must satisfy the provisions of the 1968 Convention. This has three important consequences (see paragraphs 105 to 107) for decisions concerning jurisdiction for the adjustment of maintenance orders. A fourth concerns recognition and enforcement and is mentioned now as a connected matter. (See paragraph 108).

105. On no account may the court of the State addressed examine whether the amount awarded is still appropriate, without having regard to the jurisdiction provisions of the 1968 Convention. If the proceedings are an appeal, the courts of the State of origin will remain competent. Alternatively the new action may be quite distinct from the original proceedings, in which case the jurisdiction provisions of the 1978 Convention must be observed.

106. (bb) Under the legal systems of all six original EEC States, the adjustment of maintenance orders, at any rate as far as jurisdiction is concerned, is not regarded as a remedy by way of appeal (see paragraph 100). Accordingly the courts of the State of origin lose their competence to adjust maintenance orders within the original scope of the 1968 Convention, if the conditions on which their jurisdiction was based no longer exist. The 1968 Convention could not, however, be applied consistently, if the courts in the United Kingdom were to claim jurisdiction to adjust decisions irrespective of the continued existence of the facts on which jurisdiction was originally based.

107. Applications for the adjustment of maintenance claims can only be made in courts with jurisdiction under Article 2 or Article 5 (2), as amended, of the 1968 Convention. For example, if the maintenance creditor claims adjustment due to increases in the cost of living, he may choose between the international jurisdiction of the domicile of the maintenance debtor and the local jurisdiction of the place where he himself is domiciled or habitually resident. However, if the maintenance debtor seeks adjustment because of a deterioration in his financial circumstances, he can only apply under the international jurisdiction referred to in Article 2, i.e. the jurisdiction of the domicile of the maintenance creditor, even where the original judgment (pursuant to Article 2 where it is applicable) was given in the State of his own domicile and the parties have retained their places of residence.
